A Stirring Story of Military Adventure and of a Strange Wartime Wooing

Copyright, 1912, by G. F. Putnam's Sons.

Grant, forty-three years old, medium sized and somewhat stoop shouldered, wore no marks of rank except a general's shoulder straps on his blue flannel blouse. His trousers were tucked in his boots, and he had neither sword nor sword. Lee, a dozen years older than his late adversary, had the stature and bearing of an old knight crusader. His hair and beard were silver gray. He wore a plain but handsome uniform of Confederate gray, top boots with spurs, gaiters and a dress sword. This unassuming side arm was a splendid blade engraved on one side with the motto "Aide toi et Dieu" and on the other side with the inscription, reminiscent of the camaign that had ended at Antietam, "General Robert E. Lee, from a Marylander, 1803." The terms of surrender discussed and reduced to writing at General Lee's request embraced the parole of officers and men "not to take up arms against the government of the United States until properly exchanged," arms, artillery and public property to be turned over to Federal officers, this latter provision not embracing the side arms of the Confederate officers nor their private horses or baggage. Before this draft was copied in ink for signing General Lee took opportunity to remark that his cavalrymen and many of the artillerymen owned their horses and asked whether these men as well as the officers would be permitted to retain them. "I suppose," said Grant sympathetically, "that a great many of the men in your ranks are small farmers when they are at home and in that case will need their horses just now to put in crops to carry themselves and their families through next winter. Well, then, we will have it set down that any man who claims to own a horse or mule may retain the animal and take it home with him."

Lee had the stature and bearing of an old knight crusader.

"That will have a very good effect," said Lee, much gratified. The Union commander acted with good grace in his own disposition and at the same time in perfect accord with the expressed wish of President Lincoln at Richmond, when General Weitzel had asked what he should do in regard to the "conquered people."

"Oh, if I were you I'd let 'em up easy!" was Mr. Lincoln's reply. "I'd let 'em up easy." Indeed, the behavior of Grant at Antietam touched the heights of true poetic chivalry, springing from a kind and magnanimous heart. He neither demanded nor accepted Lee's sword, as formal military custom might have justified him in doing, but actually apologized for not having his own, which in the hurry of departure had been left behind in the wagon.

CHAPTER XX. The Double Wedding.

The double wedding was to take place at St. John's, Washington. In that venerable and picturesque old church across the park from the White House the gallant and impetuous Captain Heartsease, after an intermittent courtship that had lasted considerably longer than the late civil war, was finally to claim Jenny Buckthorn as his unblushing bride. And the added feature of the occasion, arranged at the eleventh hour in consequence of the arrival of Colonel Robert Ellingham, late of the Confederate army, from a veritable Odyssey of experiences after Appomattox, was to be united inseparably with gentle but unflinching Madeline West. Such an occasion, of course, would be incomplete without Madeline's brother Kerchival and Colonel Ellingham's sister Gertrude. That happy pair of "newlyweds" were even now hastening on from Richmond for the grand matrimonial celebration of the war's ending. Dr. Ellingham had promised to come with them. The headquarters of the joyous and eventful reunion was to be the hospitable home of General Buckthorn.

The return of General Haverill was set for the very day of the wedding of his former ward, Robert Ellingham. That the call of his own home had not brought him back long before seemed unaccountable to all—most of all to his own wife, Mrs. Constance Haverill. Mrs. Haverill and her daughter Edith, as she now called poor Frank's widow, sat together in the cosy morning room of the Haverill residence the day before the day of the wedding. Edith's little son, a sturdy four-year-old, was playing a staid and somewhat solemn game of checkers on the floor.

"It seems hardly possible that the war is over," said Edith, standing at the window. "With the troops returning and the flags flying and the bands playing every day it is like a holiday. And so it is, I suppose, for those fortunate women whose husbands are coming back to them."

"Yes, Edith dear," sighed Mrs. Haverill, "to those women whose husbands are coming back to them. Ah, forgive me, pet! I was selfishly thinking of myself, but you know that in my heart I also share your grief."

"Dear, it is months since you have shown me any letter from General Haverill—from Frank's father. And did you not expect the general home before now?"

"That is what I meant when I spoke just now."

"I wonder if it is because I am here? He has never seen me, and sometimes I fear he has never forgiven our marriage—Frank's and mine."

"Nonsense, Edith child!" Mrs. Haverill rejoined quickly. "If only that were all! He will be at least as eager to see you now, and little Frankie."

"And yet, in his official report to the government, when he told the world how bravely Frankie's father died, General Haverill only wrote the name of Lieutenant Bedloe. It looks as though nothing in his mind, could atone for the disgrace his son brought upon his name."

Mrs. Haverill rose from her chair and turned away, brushing her handkerchief across her eyes, as she said, more to herself than to Edith:

"I know him so well—the pride that conquers all the tenderness in his nature. He can be silent and cold when his heart is breaking—yes, and when my heart is breaking too!"

A message came a little later from General Buckthorn saying that Captain Heartsease had something of importance for Edith and Mrs. Haverill and inviting them to come over to his house as soon as possible to receive it.

"My dear madam," said Captain Heartsease, addressing himself to Edith. "I have here the notebook of Lieutenant Frank Bedloe, otherwise Haverill, in which Miss Gertrude Ellingham wrote down his dying message to his young wife—to you, madam."

Edith seized the precious relic, clasped it to her heart, kissed it and then tried through eyes brimming with tears to scan its blurred pages while chockingly uttering her thanks to Captain Heartsease.

"How did it come into your possession?" Mrs. Haverill asked him.

"Why, you see, Miss Ellingham—now, I should say, Mrs. Colonel Kerchival West—sent it to me from Richmond as soon as she learned I was here because it was uncertain at what time the colonel would be released on his parole, and"

"Here they are!" called the deep, hoarse voice of General Buckthorn as he blustered in, attended by the faithful Sergeant Barket. "Ladies, welcome to our camp! Jenny, haven't you relieved the captain yet? Order him to the billiard room, can't you?"

"Bout face! March!" commanded Miss Buckthorn, in her strictest military style.

Heartsease marched, Jenny slipped an arm around Edith's waist and walked with her toward a window above. Mrs. Haverill would have followed, but General Buckthorn approached her, gravely and gently, to whisper:

"Will you come with me, Mrs. Haverill? I must have you by yourself, to prepare you for something that is going to startle you, but will do you good. Your husband is here, and you are going to meet him alone in the library."

The old soldier knocked, opened the door, bowed Mrs. Haverill in and then retreated.

"Constance!" exclaimed General Haverill, standing stern and impassive.

"My husband—may I still call you so, after this long separation, without one word—"

"Where is the miniature portrait which I gave you in Charleston for my son?"

"Why, your son is dead, John, and my portrait must be in the grave with him. Don't you know?"

"For answer General Haverill took the wee case from his pocket, opened it and held it forth in his extended hand. She looked at it, then at him, in wondering interrogation.

"It might have lain in the grave with Kerchival West," he said.

"What do you mean by that? You must tell me."

"I mean that I have it not from you, but from—the other. You are silent! Well, you know now why I also have been silent so long."

The unhappy wife's agitation was pitiable as, with brave self conquest, she said proudly:

"My chief witness to the truth is dead. The other you have had sufficient opportunity to examine. I should suppose, as Colonel West is not here I shall remain silent—even though that silence parts us, you and me, forever."

"And yet," he went on, pleadingly now, "as I look into your eyes I'll swear I can see only truth and loyalty there."

"No, John," she answered gently, turning away from him. "I will not accept your blind or unwilling faith."

Before he could reply the door opened very suddenly and Jenny Buckthorn peered in.

"Oh, dear! I was looking for Captain Heartsease. Please excuse—Why, General Haverill! Papa said you had come back, and I wouldn't believe him. And—haven't you seen Edith yet?"

"Not yet, but I am curious to do so as soon as possible," he replied. Then he murmured to himself, "My son's wife!"

Jenny led the way back to the drawing room, the general and Mrs. Haverill following.

Edith came forward to meet them eagerly, yet timidously. General Haverill took her hand and kissed her on the forehead, saying:

"You shall take the place my son once filled in my heart."

"You will see his own face again, sir, in our little son's," she replied. "I am happy that Frank won your forgiveness at the last and that the boy will soon be old enough to understand your words telling how his father died a hero."

"My words," repeated the general vaguely.

[Concluded next week.]

The average girl treats a new acquaintance far better than she does an old friend—the old friend thinks.

Many a young man would get a hard bump if thrown on his own resources.
