Explosive Dropped In Mine Shaft Blows Cage to Pieces.

Thirteen miners while going to work in the Diamond shaft of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Coal company at Scranton, Pa., met a hor rible death, the carriage on which they were descending the shaft being blown to pieces by the dropping of a box of dynamite by one of the men.

Their mangled bodies have been recovered from the sump into which they fell, 100 feet below the point where the explosion occurred, but so far only five have been identified.

One man escaped alive. He is Mar tin Belinski, a driver boss, who was hurled into the Clark vein, which the carriage was passing when the explosion occurred, and where he was found by rescuers attracted by his moans. His injuries are slight, but he appears to be like one crazed by the shock.

The bodies of the victims have been removed to morgues, some of them headless, and others without arms or legs.
