So, with Sidney the basis of his happiness, he made the most of his evening's freedom. He sang a little in his clear tenor-even, once when they had slowed down at a crossing, bent over audaciously and kissed Carlotta's hand in the full glare of a passing train.

"How reckless of you!"

"I like to be reckless," he replied. His boyishness annoyed Carlotta. She did not want the situation to get out of hand. Moreover, what was so real for her was only too plainly a lark for him. She began to doubt her power.

The hopelessness of her situation was dawning on her. Even when the touch of her beside him and the solitude of the country roads got in his blood, and he bent toward her, she found no encouragement in his words: "I am mad about you tonight."

She took her courage in her hands: "Then why give me up for someone else?"

"That's-different."

"Why is it different? I am a woman. I-I love you, Max. No one else will ever care as I do."

"You are in love with the Lamb!" "That was a trick. I am sorry, Max. I don't care for anyone else in the world. If you let me go I'll want to die." Then, as he was silent:

"If you'll marry me, I'll be true to you all my life. I swear it. There will be nobody else, ever." The sense, if not the words, of what he had sworn to Sidney that Sunday afternoon under the trees, on this very road! Swift shame overtook him, that he should be here, that he had allowed Carlotta to remain in ignorance of how things really stood between them.

"I'm sorry, Carlotta. It's impossible. I'm engaged to marry someone else." "Sidney Page?"-almost a whisper. "Yes."

He was ashamed at the way she took the news. If she had stormed or wept, he would have known what to do. But she sat still, not speaking.

He closed the door behind the reetly down the stairs. The crowd partlieved figure of the landlord, and, goed to let him through. ing back to Carlotta, stood looking Carlotta, crouched in her room, lis

"I don't remember. Everything went black. The lanterns-" He crossed the room deliberately and went out, closing the door behind him. He saw at once where he stoodin what danger. If she insisted that she was ill and unable to go back, there would be a fuss. The story would come out. Everything would be gone. Schwitter's, of all places! At the foot of the stairs, Schwitter pulled himself together. After all, the girl was only ill. There was nothing for the police. He looked at his watch The doctor ought to be there by this time.

Another car. Perhaps it was the doctor. A young man edged his way into the hall and confronted him. "Two people just arrived here. A

CHAPTER XXII.

It was the Lamb who received the message about Wilson; and because he was not very keen at the best, and because the news was so startling, he refused to credit his ears. "Who is this at the 'phone?"

"Le Moyne's my name. Get Dr. Ed Wilson at once. Doctor Wilson, the surgeon, has been shot," came slowly and distinctly. "Get the staff here and have a room ready. Get the operating room ready, too." The Lamb wakened then, and roused the house. He was incoherent, rather, so that Doctor Ed only learned the truth when he got to the hospital. "Who has been shot? I thought you said-" The Lamb turned pale at that, and braced himself. "I'm sorry-I thought you understood. I believe it's not-not serious It's Doctor Max. sir."

Doctor Ed, who was heavy and not very young, sat down on an office chair. Out of sheer habit he had brought the bag. He put it down on the floor beside him, and moistened his lips. "Is he living?"

"Oh, yes, sir. I gathered that Mr. Le Moyne did not think it serious." He lied, and Doctor Ed knew he lied. The Lamb stood by the door, and Doctor Ed sat and waited. The office (Continued on page 7, column 1.)

"You must have expected it, sooner or later."

Still she made no reply. He thought she might faint, and looked at her anxiously. Her profile, indistinct beside him, looked white and drawn, But Carlotta was not fainting. She was making a desperate plan. If their escapade became known, it would end things between Sidney and him. She was sure of that. She needed time to think it out. It must become known without any apparent move on her part. If, for instance, she became ill. and was away from the hospital all night, that might answer. The thing would be investigated, and who knew-

The car turned in at Schwitter's road and drew up before the house. The narrow porch was filled with small tables, above which hung rows of electric lights inclosed in Japanese paper lanterns. Midweek, which had found the White Springs hotel almost deserted, saw Schwitters' crowded tables set out under the trees. Seeing the crowd, Wilson drove directly to the yard and parked his machine.

"No need of running any risk," he explained to the still figure beside him. "We can walk back and take a table under the trees, away from those infernal lanterns."

She reeled a little as he helped her out.

"Not sick, are you?"

"I'm dizzy. I'm all right." She looked white. He felt a stab of pity for her. She leaned rather heavily on him as they walked toward the house. The faint perfume that had almost intoxicated him, earlier, vaguely irritated him now.

At the rear of the house she shook off his arm and preceded him around the building. She chose the end of the porch as the place in which to drop, and went down like a stone.

There was a moderate excitement. The visitors at Schwitter's were too much engrossed with themselves to be much interested. She opened her eyes almost as soon as she fell-to forestall any tests; she was shrewd enough to know that Wilson would detect her malingering very quickly-and begged to be taken into the house.

"I feel very ill," she said, and her white face bore her out.

Schwitter and Wilson carried her in and up the stairs to one of the rooms. The little man was twittering with anxiety. He had a horror of knockout drops and the police. They laid her on the bed, her hat beside her; and Wilson, stripping down the long sleeve of her glove, felt her pulse. "There's a doctor in the next town," said Schwitter. "I sent for him a while ago-my wife's not very well." "I'm a doctor." "Is it anything serious?" "Nothing serious."
