Cunningham, and Manna got the critter fixed up and then went away into a back field where they would not be observed and went to it. The tractor performed beautifully throwing two clean regular furrows and not making a single halk. Some rocks too big for two men to handle were turned up and several loosened that were so large that they will have to be blasted before they can be gotten out. All this was done without apparently interfering with either tractor or plows and a fourth of the big field was finished while they thought they had been doing nothing. Needless to say Mr. Kline is delighted and sees his spring plowing as a matter that is not going to give him any more concern than driving his Stude into town.
