THE ARAB'S BEST FRIEND.

Many Americans know just about three facts concerning the camel: He has a remarkable hump on his back; he is used as a beast of burden, and he can go without drinking longer than most animals.
 To the Arab the camel means for more; not only can he carry his master and most of his master's worldly goods, but he can supply, when necessary, nearly all the fundamental essentials of life.
 The camel's flesh is decidedly edible. When young it tastes like veal, and the hump, Arabs say, has the flavor of beef. The milk is excellent and nutritious, though it supplies no butter.
 Food and drink are worth much, but this wonderful beast goes farther. He supplies much of the natives' clothing. Every summer the long hair is shorn and woven into a variety of articles—chiefly clothing and tent coverings. It was in camel's-hair garments that John the Baptist appeared as a preacher. The thick hide of the camel makes good leather. Food, drink, shelter, clothing, draft service, docility, and reliability—surely this is a great deal from one animal.
