The BLIND MAN'S EYES

WILLIAM MACHARG DWIN BALMER Illustrations by R.H.Livingstone

cess."

to translate."

had tried to do so, but without suc-

"Also," the blind man continued,

"there was a telegram which definitely showed that there was some con-and me, as well as a second-or gram in cipher, which we were able Eaton leaned forward, impelled to speak; but as Santoine clearly detected this impulse and waited to hear

ou Understand Aiready," Santoine

nat he was going to say, Eaton re-

"You were going to say something ut that telegram in cipher?" San-made today to run you down, you were also going to speak of it: for that attempt makes clear the meaning of the telegram. Its meaning was not clear to me before, you understand.

as you had occupied before the car ahead of you had been cut out. I sleeper from the front."

"What do you mean?"

was in Section Three in the third

Eaton stared at Santoine, fascinated; what had been only vague,

half felt, half formed with himself,

was becoming definite, tangible, under the blind man's reasoning. His hands closed instinctively. in his emotion.

"You understand already," Santoine asserted. "The attack made on me was meant for you. Someone stealing through the cars from the front to the rear of the train and carrying in his mind the location of Section Three in the third car, struck through the curtains by mistake at me instead of

"I den't know," Eaton answered.

"You mean you prefer to shield

"That is what you are doing, is it not? For, even if you don't know the man directly, you know in whose cause and under whose direction he murdered Warden-and why and for whom he is attempting to murder

In his intensity, Santoine had lifted himself from his pillows. "Who is that man?" he challenged. "And what is that connection between you and me which, when the attack found and disabled me instead of you, told him that-in spite of his mistake-his result had been accomplished? told him that, if I was dying, a repetition of the attack against you was unneces-

Eaton knew that he had grown very pale; Harriet must be aware of the Eaton remained silent.

you. Who was that, Eaton?"

him?"

you."

sary?"

"Shield him?"

Asserted.

asidered and kept silent.

'No," Eaton denied.

ae asked.

Eaton wet his lips.

COPYRIGHT BY LITTLE, BROWN, AND COMPANY ter to find out who you were, and she

SYNOPSIS

CHAPTER I.—Gabriel Warden, Seattle capitalist, tells his butler he is expecting a caller, to be admitted without question. He informs his wife of danger that threatens him if he pursues a course he considers the only honorable one. Warden leaves the house in his car and meets a man whom he takes into the machine. When the car returns home, Warden is found dead, murdered, and alone. The caller, a young man, has been at Warden's house, but leaves unobserved.

CHAPTER II.—Bob Connery, conductor, receives orders to hold train for a party. Five men and a girl board the train. The father of the girl, Mr. Dorne, is the person for whom the train was held Philip D. Eaton, a young man, also boarded the train. Dorne tells his daughter and his secretary, Don Avery, to find out what they can concerning him. out what they can concerning

CHAPTER III.—The two make Eaton's acquaintance. The train is stopped by showdrifts, CHAPTER IV.—Eaton receives a telegram addressed to Lawrence Hillward, which he claims. It warns him he is being followed.

CHAPTER V.—Passing through the car, Connery notices Dorne's hand hanging outside the berth. He ascertains Dorne's bell has recently rung. Perturbed, he investigates and finds Dorne with his skull crushed. He calls a surgeon, Dr. Sinclair, on the train.

CHAPTER VI.—Sinclair recognizes the injured man as Basil Santolne, who, although blind, is a peculiar power in the financial world as adviser to "big interests." His recovery is a matter of doubt CHAPTER VIII.—Eaton is practically placed under arrest. He refuses to make explanations as to his previous movements before boarding the train, but admits he was the man who called on warden the night the financier was murdered.

CHAPTER IX.—Eaton pleads with Har-riet Santoine to withhold judgment, tell-ing her he is in serious danger, though innocent of the crime against her father. He feels the girl believes him.

CHAPTER X.—Santoine recovers suffi-ciently to question Eaton, who refuses to reveal his identity. The financier re-quires Eaton to accompany him to the Santoine home, where he is in the posi-tion of a semi-prisoner.

CHAPTER XI.—Eaton meets a resident of the house, Wallace Blatchford, and a young girl, Mildred Davis, with whom apparently he is acquainted, though they conceal the fact. Eaton's mission is to secure certain documents which are vital to his interests, and his being admitted to the house is a remarkable stroke of luck. The girl agrees to aid him. He becomes deeply interested in Harriet Santolne, and she in him.

CHAPTER XII.—Harriet tells Eaton she and Donald Avery act as "eyes" to Sanand Donald Avery act as "eyes" to stoine, reading to him the documents which he bases his judgments which he bases his judgments. While walking with her, two men in an automobile deliberately attempt to run Eaton down. He escapes with slight injuries. The girl recognizes one of the men as having been on the train on which they having been on the came from Seattle.

(Continued from last week). It said only that you were known and followed. It did not say why you "Just ten days ago," he said evenly were followed. I could not be certain and dispassionately, "I was found unof that; there were several possible conscious in my berth-Section Three reasons why you might be followedof the rearmost sleeper-on the transeven that the 'one' who 'was follow continental train, which I had taken ing' might be someone secretly inter with my daughter and Avery at Seested in preventing you from an atattle. I had been attacked—assailed tack on me. Now, however, I know during my sleep some time in that, that the reason you feared the man first night that I spent on the trainwho was following was because you and my condition was serious enough expected him to attack you. Knowso that for three days afterward I ing that, Eaton-knowing that, I want was not allowed to receive any of the to call your attention to the peculiarparticulars of what had happened to ity of our mutual positions on the me. When I did finally learn them. train. You had asked for and were I naturally attempted to make certain occupying Section Three in the third deductions as to who it was that had sleeper, in order-I assume and, I beattempted to murder me, and why; lieve, correctly-to avoid being put in and ever since, I have continued to the same car with me. In the night. occupy myself with those questions. the second sleeper-the car next in I am going to tell you a few of my front of yours-was cut off from the deductions. If you fancy I am at train and left behind. That made me fault in my conclusions, wait until you occupy in relation to the forward part discover your error." of the train exactly the same position

Santoine waited an instant: Eaton thought it was to allow him to speak if he wanted to, but Eaton merely

"The first thing I learned," the blind man went on, "was the similarity of the attack on me to the more successful attack on Warden, twelve days previous, which had caused his death. The method of the two attacks was the same; the conditions surrounding them were very similar. The desperate nature of the two attacks, and their almost identical method, made it practically certain that they originated at the same source and were carried out-probably-by the same hand and for the same purpose.

"Mrs. Warden's statement to me of her interview with her husband a half-hour before his murder, made it certain that the object of the attack on him was to 'remove' him. It seemed almost inevitable, therefore, that the attack on me must have been for the same purpose.

"I found that a young man-yourself-had acted so suspiciously both before and after the attack on me that both Avery and the conductor in charge of the train had become convinced that he was my assailant. and had segregated him from the rest of the passengers. Not only this, but -and this seemed quite conclusive to them-you admitted that you were the one who had called upon Warden the evening of his murder. It seemed likely, too, that you were the only person on the train aside from my daughter and Avery who knew who I was; for I had had reason to believe from the time when I first heard you speak when you boarded the train. that you were someone with whom I had previously, very briefly come in contact; and I had asked my daugh effect Santoine's words had on him to see how much she was comprehend-"I don't understand." He fought to

but he did not dare look at her now compose himself.

"It is perfectly plain," Santoine said patiently. "It was believed at first that I had been fatally hurt; it was even reported at one time-I understand-that I was dead; only intimate friends have been informed of my actual condition. Yesterday, for the first time, the newspapers announced the certainty of my recovery; and today an attack is made on you. They did not hesitate to attack you in sight of my daughter." "But-"

"You are merely challenging my deductions! Will you reply to my questions?-tell me the connection between us?-who you are?" "No." "Come here!" "What?" said Eaton.

"Come here-close to me, beside the bed."

Eaton hesitated, and then obeyed. "Bend over!"

Eaton stooped, and the blind man's hands seized him. Instantly Eaton nection, unknown to me, between you withdrew. "Wait!' Santoine warned. "If you rather a previous—suspicious tele- do not stay, I shall call help." One hand went to the bell beside his bed. Harriet had risen; she met Eaton's gaze warningly and nodded to him to comply. He bent again over the bed.

He felt the blind man's sensitive fingers searching his features, his head. his throat. Eaton gazed at Santoine's face while the fingers were examining him; he could see that Santoine was merely finding confirmation of an impression already gained from what he had been told him about Eaton. San toine showed nothing more than this confirmation; certainly he did not recognize Eaton. More than this, Eaton could not tell. "Now your hands," Santoine ordered.

Eaton extended one hand and then the other; the blind man felt over them from wrists to the tips of the fingers; then he let himself sink back against the pillows, absorbed in thought.

"You may go," Santoine said at last. "Go?" Eaton asked.

"You may leave the room. Blatchford will meet you downstairs." Santoine reached for the house telephone beside his bed-receiver and transmitter on one light bar-and gave directions to have Blatchford await Eaton in the hall below. Eaton was distinctly frightened by the revelation he just had had of Santoine's clear, implacable reasoning re garding him; for none of the blind man's deductions about him had been wrong-all had been the exact though incomplete truth. It was Plear to him that Santoine was close -much closer even than Santoine himself yet appreciated-to knowing Baton's identity; it was even prob-I think you were; and I think that ! able that one single additional factfew minutes ago when I said you the discovery, for instance, that Miss were not surprised by the attempt Davis was the source of the second telegram received by Eaton on the train-would reveal everything to Saptoine. And Eaton was not certain that Santoine, even without any new information, would not reach the truth unaided at any moment. So Eaton knew that he himself must act before this happened. But so long as the safe in Santoine's study was kept locked or was left open only while someone was in the room with it, he could not act until he had received help from outside; and he had not yet received that help; he could not hurry it or even tell how soon it was likely to come.

As his mind reviewed, almost instantaneously, these considerations. he glanced again at Harriet; her eyes, this time, met his, but she looked away immediately. As he went toward the door, she made no move to accompany him. He went out without speaking and closed the inner and the outer doors behind him; then he went down to Blatchford.

For several minutes after Eaton had left the room, Santoine thought in silence. "Where are you, Harriet?" he asked at last.

She knew it was not necessary to answer him, but merely to move so that he could tell her position; she moved slightly, and his sightless eyes shifted at once to where she stood.

"How did he act?" Santoine asked. She reviewed swiftly the conversation, supplementing his blind apperceptions of Eaton's manner with what she herself had seen.

"What have been your impressions of Eaton's previous social condition, Daughter?" he asked. "You have talked with him, been with him -both on the train and here: have you been able to determine what sort of people he has been accustomed to mix with? Have his friends been business men? Professional men? Society people?" The deep and unconcealed note of trouble in her father's voice startled her, in her familiarity with every tone and every expression. She answered his question: "I don't know, Father." "I want you to find out."

"In what way?" "You must find a way. I shall tell Avery to help." He thought for several moments, while she stood wait-the men in it traced, of course. Harriet, there are certain matters-correspondence - which Avery has been looking after for me; do you know what correspondence I mean?" "Yes. Father." "I would rather not have Avery

ing. "We must have that motor and bothered with it just now; I want him to give his whole attention to this present inquiry. You yourself will assume charge of the correspondence of which I speak, Daughter." "Yes, Father. Do you want anything else now?" "Not of you; send Avery to me." CHAPTER XIV

Donald Avery Is Moody. Harriet went down the stairs into the study; she passed through the study into the main part of the house and found Donald and sent him to her father; then she returned to the study.

She Removed the Books in Front of a Wall Safe to the Right of the Door.

after glancing about the room, she removed the books in front of a wallsafe to the right of the door, slid back the movable panel, opened the safe and took out a bundle of correspondence. She closed safe and panel and put back the books; and carrying the correspondence to her father's desk, she began to look over it.

This correspondence—a considerable bundle of letters held together with wire clips and the two envelopes bound with tape which she had put into the safe the day before-made up the papers of which her father had spoken to her. These letters represented the contentions of willful, powerful and sometimes ruthless and violent men. Ruin of one man by another-ruin financial, social or moral, or all three together-was the intention of the principals concerned in this correspondence; too often, she knew, one man or one group had carried out a fierce intent upon another; and sometimes, she was aware, these bitter feuds had carried certain of her father's clients further even than personal or family ruin; fraud, violence and-twice now-even murder were represented by this correspondence; for the papers relating to the Warden and the Latron murders were here. She had felt always the horror business had been far from her And while she went out. She went strangely, she now realized that it was not the attacks on Mr. Warden and her father-overwhelming with horror as these had been-which were bringing that appreciation home to her. It was her understanding now that the attack was not meant for her father but for Eaton. Though Harriet had never believed that Eaton had been concerned in the attack upon her father, her denial of it bad been checked and stifled becouse he would not even defend himself. She had not known what to think; she had seemed to herself to be waiting with her thoughts in abevance: until he should be cleared, sne about Eaton than was necessary. Though he was involved with her fother in some way, she refused to believe he was against her father, but clearly be was not with him. How could be be involved, then, unless the injury he had suffered was some such act of man against man as these letters and statements represented? She tooked carefully through all the contents of the envelopes, but she could not find anything which helped her. She pushed the letters away, then, and sat thinking. Mr. Warden, who appeared to have known more about Eaton than anyone else, had taken Eaton's side: it was because he had been going to help Eaton that Mr. Warden had been killed. Would not her father be ready to help Eaton, then, if he bnew as much about him as Mr. Warden had known? But Mr. Warden apparently, had kept what he knew even from his own wife; and Eaton was now keeping it from everyoneher father included. She felt that her father had understood and appreciated all this long before herself-that it was the reason for his attitude toward Eaton on the train and, in part, the cause of his considerate treatment of him all through. So, instead of being estranged by Eaton's manner to her father, she felt an impulse of feeling toward him flooding her, a feeling which she tried to explain to herself as sympathy. But it was not just sympathy; she would not say even to herself what it was.

She got up suddenly and went to the door and looked into the hall; a servant came to her. "Is Mr. Avery still with Mr. San-toine?" she asked. "No, Miss Santoine; he has gone out."

"Thank you."

She went back, and bundling the correspondence together as it had been pefore, she removed the books from a shelf to the left of the door, slid back another panel and revealed a second wall-safe corresponding to the one to the right of the door from which she had taken the papers. The combination of this second safe was known only to her father and herself. She put the envelopes into it, closed it, and replaced the books. Then she went to her father's desk, took from a drawer a long typewritten report of which he had asked her to prepare a digest, and read it through; consciously concentrating, she began her work. At three she heard Avery's motor, and went to the study door and looked out. as he entered the hall.

"What have you found, Don?" she inquired.

"Nothing yet, Harry."

"You got no trace of them?"

"No; too many motors pass on that road for the car to be recalled particularly. I've started what inquiries are possible and arranged to have the road watched in case they come back this way."

He went past her and up to her father. She returned to the study and put away her work. Dinner was served in the great Jacobean dining room, with walls paneled to the high ceiling, logs blazing in the big stone fireplace. As they seated themselves, she noted that Avery seemed moody and uncommunicative; something, clearly, had irritated and disturbed him; and as the meal progressed, he vented his irritation upon Eaton by affronting him more openly by word and look than he had ever done before in her presence. She was the more surprised at his doing this now, because she knew that Donald must have received from her father the same instructions as had been given herself to learn whatever was possible of Eaton's former position in life.

Before Eaton's entrance into her life she had supposed that some time. as a matter of course, she was going to marry Donald. In spite of this, she had never thought of herself as apart from her father; when she thought of marrying, it had been always with the idea that her duty to her husband must be secondary to that to her father; she knew now that she had accepted Donald Avery not because he had become necessary to her but because he had seemed essential to her father and her marrying Donald would permit her life to go on much as it was. Donald had social position and a certain amount of wealth and power; now suddenly she was feeling that he nad nothing but these things, that his own unconscious admission was that to be worth while he must have them, that to retain and increase them was his only object in life. She had the feeling that these were the only things he would fight for: but that for these he would fight-fairly, perhaps, if he could-but, if he must, unfairly, despicably. She had finished dinner, but she hes-Itated to rise and leave the men alone; after-dinner cigars and the fiction of the masculine conversation about the table were insisted on by of this violent and ruthless side of Blatchford. As she delayed, looking the men with whom her father dealt; across the table at Eaton, his eyes but now she knew that actual appremet hers; reassured, she rose at once: ciation of the crimes that passed as the three rose with her and stood stairs and looked in upon her father; he wanted nothing, and after a conversation with him as short as she could make it, she came down again. No further disagreement between the two men, apparently, had happened after she left the table. Avery now was not visible. Eaton and Blatchford were in the music-room. With a repugnance against her father's orders which she had never felt before she began to carry out the instructions her father had given her.

She noticed that Eaton was familiar with almost everything she had liked which had been written or was curvent up to five years before; all later had tried not to let herself think more | music was strange to him. To this extent he had been of her world. plainly, up to five years before; then he had gone out of it.

She realized this only as something which she was to report to her father; yet she felt a keener, more personal interest in it than that. Harriet Santoine knew enough of the world to know that few men break completely all social connections without some link of either fact or memory still bolding them, and that this link most often is a woman.

Toward ten o'clock Eaton excused himself and went to his rooms. She sat for a time, idly talking with Blatchford; then, as a servant passed through the hall and she mistook momentarily his footsteps for those of Avery, she got up suddenly and went upstairs. It was only after reaching her rooms that she appreciated that the meaning of this action was that she shrank from seeing Avery again that night. But she had been in her rooms only a few minutes when her

"Will You Come Down for a Few Minutes, Please, Harry?"

house telephone buzzed, and answer-his irritation, or at least had concealed it; his concern now seemed to be only over his relations with herself. "We've not quarreled, Harry?" be isked.

"Quarreled? Not at all, Don," she ephed.

She moved toward the door; he followed and let her out, and she west eack to her own rooms.

CHAPTER XV

Santoine's "Eyes" Fail Him.

Eaton, coming down rather late the aext morning, found the breakfast room empty. He chose his breakfast from the dishes on the sideboard, and while the servant set them before him and waited on him. he inquired after the members of the household. Miss Santoine, the servant said, had breaktasted some time before and was now with her father; Mr. Avery also had preakfasted; Mr. Blatchford was not yet down. As Eaton lingered over his preakfast, Miss Davis passed through the hall, accompanied by a maid. The maid admitted her into the study and closed the door; afterward, the maid remained in the hall busy with some morning duty, and her presence and that of the servant in the breakfast room made it impossible for Eaton to attempt to go to the study or to risk speaking to Miss Davis. A few minutes later, he heard Harriet Santoine descending the stairs; rising, he went out into the hall to meet her.

"I don't ask you to commit yourse!f for longer than today, Miss Santoine," he said, when they had exchanged greetings, "but-for today-what are the limits of my leash?"

"Mr. Avery is going to the country club for lunch; I believe he intends to ask you if you care to go with him." She turned away and went into the study, closing the door behind her. Eaton, although he had finished his breakfact, went back into the breakfast room. He did not know whether he would refuse or accept Avery's invitation; suddenly he decided. After waitnig for some five minutes there over a second cup of coffee, he got up and crossed to the study.

"I beg pardon, Miss Santoine," he explained his interruption, "but you did not tell me what time Mr. Avery is likely to want me to be ready to go to the country club."

"About half-past twelve, I think." "And what time shall we be coming back?"

"Probably about five."

ing it, she found that it was Donald speaking to her.

"Will you come down for a few minutes, please. Harry?" Some strangeness in his tone perplexed her.

"Where are you?" she asked. "In the study."

She went down at once. As he came to the study door to meet her, she saw that what had perplexed her in his tone was apparently only the remnant of that irritation he had showed at dinner. He took her hand and drew her into the study.

"You don't mind my calling you down, Harry; it is so long since we had even a few minutes alone together," he pleaded. "What is it you want, Don?" she asked. "Only to see you, dear-Harry." He took her hand again; she resisted and withdrew it. "I can't do any more work tonight, Harry. I find the correspondence I expected to go over this evening isn't here; your father has it,

I suppose." "No; I have it, Don."

"You?"

"Yes; Father didn't want you bothered by that work just now. Didn't he tell you?"

"He told me that, of course, Harry, and that he had asked you to relieve me as much as you could; he didn't say he had told you to take charge of the papers. Did he do that?"

"I thought that was implied. If you need them, I'll get them for you, Don. Do you want them?"

She got up and went toward the safe where she had put them; suddenly she stopped. What it was that she had felt under his tone and manner, she could not tell; it was probably only irritation at having important work taken out of his hands. But whatever it was, he was not openly expressing it-he was even being careful that it should not be expressed. And now suddenly, as he followed and came close behind her and her mind went swiftly to her father lying helpless upstairs, and her father's trust in her, she halted.

"We must ask Father," she said. "Ask him!" he ejaculated, "Why?" She faced him uncertainly, not answering.

"That's rather ridiculous, Harry, especially as it is too late to ask him tonight." His voice was suddenly rough in his irritation. "I have had charge of those very things for years; they concern the matters in which your father particularly confides in me. It is impossible that he meant you to take them out of my hands like this. He must have meant only that you were to give me what help you could with them! Harry, don't you see that you are putting me in a false positionwronging me? You are acting as though you did not trust me!"

"I do trust you, Don; at least I have ne reason to distrust you. I only say we must ask Father."

"They're in your little safe?"

She nodded. "Yes." "And you'll not give them to me?"

He stared angrily; then he shrugged and laughed and went back to his desk and began gathering up his scattered papers. She stood indecisively watching him. Suddenly he looked up, and she saw that he had quite communed (To be Continued.)