TO MAKE ALCOHOL.

More than 400,000 cords of wood are used annually in Pennsylvania's 35 hardwood distillation plants, a survey by the Department of Forests and Waters shows. Alcohol, wood tar, wood gas, acetate of lime and char-coal are obtained from this distillation, known as the destructive method, Professor J. S. Illick, chief of the Division of Research says.

Practically all the plants are found in the northern part of the State where the hardwoods—beech, birch Hecla park for some of our people.

Mr. and Mrs. Cyrus Brungard are entertaining their daughters and their of the total number of the State's plants.

Each cord of wood produces an av erage of nine gallons of wood alcohol, 17 gallons of wood tar, 189 pounds of acetate of lime and 45 bushels of char-coal. The amount of wood gas pro-duced has not been determined definitely, Professor Illick said. The survey shows the tar and gas are used under the boilers, with the other products being in demand in the com-mercial field.

The first plant for the distillation of hardwood was erected in Wayne county in 1876, the survey revealed and was the outgrowth of the old method of burning charcoal in out-door kilns. Under this system of production the by-products were wasted, Professor Illick pointed out, declaring that with destructive distilla-tion there is little waste.

These plants use wood down to a two-inch diameter and provide the most economical utilization of forests that prevails in the commercial world, it was declared in the survey.
