

The Life of President Wilson Ebbd Peacefully Away.

take up his duties at Washington.

The policy of the new administration was outlined in one of the briefest inaugural addresses ever made to Congress. Among other innovations, Mr. Wilson announced a policy of "painless publicity" and, until May, 1916, gave semi-weekly audiences to the Washington newspaper correspondents. He said the White House would be "wide open" but correspondents were not seen by him during the war.

COUNSELLED NEUTRALITY.

When the European conflict burst upon the world in all its fury, President Wilson in an address to his fellow countrymen counseled them to be strictly neutral. Exerting every effort to avert the drawing of the United States into the mad storm, for nearly three years he drew upon himself the bitterest criticism of some of his staunchest friends. About this time, speaking of the example of America in regard to peace, he said: "There is such a thing as a man being too proud to fight. There is such a thing as a nation being so right that it does not need to convince others by force that it is right."

Popular resentment against peace at any price was rising in America. Fighting Europe ridiculed Mr. Wilson's policy but later accepted the explanation of his friends that he was maneuvering for delay, that the United States was not prepared to take a big part in the struggle, that the nation was not united for war by reasons of its diverse population and divided sentiment.

A tragic moment in the President's life came, when, sitting at the bedside of his dying wife, he penned a message to the European powers suggesting a peaceful settlement. Mrs. Wilson died on August 6, 1914, and the President took her body to her girlhood home in Rome, Ga., for burial. The family circle had been broken only a short time previously by the marriage of two of the President's daughters, Jessie and Eleanor, one to Francis Bowes Sayre and the other to William G. McAdoo, then Secretary of the Treasury. Mrs. Wilson's death left the President alone except for his eldest daughter, Margaret, who was absent much of the time in welfare work.

On May 7, 1915, the great steamship Lusitania was torpedoed and sunk off the coast of Ireland with the loss of 1,500 lives, more than 110 of them American and many women and children. There was a widespread clamor in the United States for war.

Ship after ship had been sent to the bottom without warning and this climax came with the sinking on March 24, 1916, of the English Channel steamer Sussex. The President, in a final note, served notice on the German Emperor that he might expect war with the United States if the "inhuman and illegal" practices continued. His warning to Germany that she would be held to a strict accountability and his later declaration that America would use "force without limit," stirred responsive chords in the hearts of most Americans.

BROKE WITH BERLIN.

President Wilson accordingly broke off diplomatic relations with the Berlin government and gave Count von Bernstorff, the German Ambassador, his passports. Everybody knew it meant war, that the conflict was close at hand.

Meanwhile, a happy domestic event even in the President's life served to lighten the burden of his official cares. He was married to Mrs. Edith Bolling Galt, the widow of a Washington merchant, who immediately became his constant companion and confidante.

Internal affairs in the United States early in 1917 were in a state of restiveness verging on turmoil. Enemy propagandists were busy night and day. The increasing cost of living was of grave concern to wage earners. Scores of strikes in industrial plants and on railroads were fomented by Austro-German plotters. In a final note, served notice on the German Emperor that he might expect war with the United States if the "inhuman and illegal" practices continued. His warning to Germany that she would be held to a strict accountability and his later declaration that America would use "force without limit," stirred responsive chords in the hearts of most Americans.

The United States never had been a military nation. Her regular army establishment of 75,000 men seemed pitifully weak when England and France were sending millions of fighters to the battle line. President Wilson at once urged the passage of a conscription bill by Congress by which men from 21 to 31 were to be drawn by lot. It was called the "selective service act" and, based upon the experiences of the other allied nations, was intended to raise an army without demoralizing essential trade and industry. The law was enacted after an exciting but short debate in both Houses on April 28, 1917, just three weeks after the United States declared herself to be in "a state of war with Germany." Subsequently a similar declaration was issued against Austria.

DRAFT MACHINERY STARTED.

Draft machinery was put in motion and despite the derision of the German general staff, "the most remarkable achievement in the history of all warfare," according to General Peyton C. March, the American chief of staff, was accomplished. Training camps were located throughout the country and within a year nearly 2,000,000 armed and equipped soldiers were landed in England and France. A second draft, registering men from 18 to 21 and from 31 to 45 was ordered to bring America's fighting force in Europe up to 4,850,000 men, but few of these were called as the central powers shortly after collapsed.

Meanwhile the United States navy had been greatly augmented, and on November 11, 1918, when the armistice was signed, she had 338 warships and 70,000 enlisted men in service abroad.

Not the least important of other war measures adopted at the behest of Mr. Wilson during his second administration were the federalization of the railroads, cables, telephones and telegraph systems and the plan for the upbuilding by the government itself of a great American merchant marine. For the last named purpose alone Congress appropriated the sum of $2,850,000,000. Later these public utilities were returned to private control.

Three Philadelphians in the Near East

A new city of Philadelphia has been started in the heart of the Caucasus mountains, on the eastern slopes of Mount Ararat, according to a cablegram received recently by the local offices of the Near East Relief. The cablegram, sent from Alexandropol, Armenia, says:

"A model Armenian village, including houses, barns, cattle sheds, community gardens and park, has been erected by the boys classes in home economics at the Near East relief orphanage for 17,000 children here. In this village, orphan girls will go through the processes of home life, learning to cook native dishes, weave the native cloth and rugs, and will obtain the training in home life denied them by the death of their parents and the wrecking of their homes. "The village has been named Philadelphia in recognition of the large contributions made toward this orphanage work by the people of that city. The name in Armenian is 'Yeghpairagon-Taer.'"

This is the third town to bear the name of Philadelphia in the Near East. The other two, dating back twenty centuries or more, are located, one in Palestine, and the other near Smyrna in Asia Minor, and were founded by the ancient Greeks. Yeghpairagon-Taer is the Armenian equivalent for "brotherly love." A total of 11,970,000 pounds of food supplies, medicines and clothing passed through the overseas shipping stations of the Near East relief at Constantinople and in Athens from American ports during the past year. These shipments had a total value of $3,407,000. Fifteen percent of the donated merchandise came from Pennsylvania.

New Descriptive Map Folder of Pennsylvania Railroad.

The passenger department of the Pennsylvania Railroad system has just issued a specially attractive and educational piece of literature in the form of a descriptive map folder which is attracting considerable favorable attention.

The folder is an artistic piece of printing in four colors and contains newly engraved maps of New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Chicago and St. Louis, and a large map of the United States in colors, showing the location of all national parks and monuments, together with a mass of instructive data of exceptional interest.

This folder will be mailed free upon request to D. N. Bell, passenger traffic manager, Pennsylvania Railroad, Broad street station, Philadelphia.

Steel Shavings on Fire.

A pile of steel shavings recently took fire at a large dynamo factory, presenting the unusual spectacle of a bonfire of steel. The shavings became heated from some rubbish burning nearby, and water proved useless in extinguishing the blazing steel. It was finally necessary to rake the pile apart in order to subdue the flames. In such a pile of steel oxidation takes place faster than the resulting heat can be carried away, and any heating from an outside source may actually lead to combustion.—Washington Star.

Seein' Things.

From the Lancaster New Era. It is foolish to hope for the enactment of any broad constructive legislative program in a Congress as sharply divided as the present, with small groups of insurgents holding the balance of power in each branch and glorifying on every opportunity to display their strength. But that does not extenuate or excuse childish phanton fighting. Our Senators and Representatives are "seein' things at night."
