40,000 Acres of Potatoes Being Sprayed in Pennsylvania.

To miss a potato spray applications at this time is serious business, say specialists at The Pennsylvania State College. Growers should make sure that applications of Bordeaux mixture are made every ten days during the growing season. Even one miss may be the cause of serious losses.

Almost 40,000 acres of potatoes are being sprayed in the Keystone State this season, say extension specialists. Part of this is being covered by 42 spray rings, where several growers go together and provide a machine and an operator to keep spraying their potato vines throughout the summer. Seven of these operators are students from the agricultural school at State College. In the spray rings an effort is made to get an application of spray on each field once every ten days. The 42 rings are in operation in 18 counties, including one in Philadelphia county where a student operator cares for seventy acres.

A total of 103 students failed to pass the required amount of work during the second semester of The Pennsylvania State College, according to statistics just made public by the college registrar. The engineering school had the most failures with 34, but this school also has the largest enrollment. The Liberal Arts school was second in failures with 32, and the school of agriculture third with 14. According to the registrar, this is about the usual percentage of failures.
