RETAILERS MUST COUNT OYSTERS FOR CONSUMERS.

The coming of fall weather gives oysters their usual winter popularity as a food. Consumers buying for the first time this season may be a little perplexed when they find it necessary to specify the number of oysters wanted instead of the usual pint or quart order.
Retailers are required by the Act of March 17, 1925, to sell all oysters, except those shipped in sealed containers, by numerical count. The old method of buying oysters by the pint or quart is prohibited and consumers are thereby protected from buying excess water, as was frequently the case under the old method of sales. In some cases, as found by the Bureau of Foods and Chemistry, oysters, when purchased by the quart or pint were found to contain as much as 50 per cent of added water or excess liquor.
One of the purposes of this Act as pointed out by Director Kellogg is to not only prohibit the practice of adding water to oysters, but to prevent contamination of oysters, which frequently occurred when water or natural ice were added. The best way for oysters to be cooled and kept in proper condition is for them to be iced in the same manner as ice cream is kept in condition by packing ice around the container.
It is anticipated that this new law will be a means of saving money to the consumers, who might otherwise purchase large quantities of water at oyster prices, and likewise a protection to the public health by reducing the possibility of contamination.
