ARMY AIR ACE CRACKED UP ON JACK'S MOUNTAIN.

Though Badly Injured Sticks to Ship Twenty-seven Hours Then Crawled Three Miles to Public Highway.

Lying on a bed in the Centre County hospital from Wednesday until yesterday Lieut. Cyrus K. Bettis, one of the most intrepid aviators in the U. S. army air service, is badly battered and bruised as the result of his plane crashing into the trees on the side of Jack's mountain, in the Seven mountain range, on Monday afternoon, but while serious, his injuries are not regarded as critical. His left leg is broken above the ankle, his nose broken and both upper and lower jaw fractured in two places while the pupil of his left eye is somewhat contused but it is not believed the sight will be destroyed.

Lieut. Bettis had a miraculous escape from death, and the nerve he displayed in crawling almost three miles on his hands and knees out of the deep fastnesses of the mountain was little short of marvelous. The lieutenant was one of three army fliers enroute from the Sesqui-Centennial in Philadelphia to Selfridge field, Mich., the other two being Lieuts. Luther S. Smith and John J. Williams. On their course westward they flew up the Juniata valley to Lewistown, thence took their course across the Seven mountains to Bellefonte. In crossing the mountains the aviators ran into a dense fog. Lieut. Smith was able to keep his course and got over all right, reaching his destination late in the afternoon. Lieut. Williams crossed the mountains safely but losing his course came down at the Bellefonte flying field at 12:45 and later continued his journey to Selfridge field.

Lieut. Bettis not only lost his course in the fog but evidently became bewildered and in flying around sailed into the south side of Jack's mountain near the top. According to indications his plane went to the ground nose first, rebounded and struck the ground a second time. The motor was torn loose and lay fifteen feet from the crumpled wings and fuselage, while the broken propellers and radiator lay in another direction. How the lieutenant escaped being crushed to death is hard to figure out. At that he was knocked unconscious and was in that condition for an hour and a half. He fell at 1:15 o'clock on Monday so that it was close to three o'clock when he came to and realized that he was still in the land of the living, though badly battered up. He was able, however, to release himself from his wrecked plane and crawl out of the cockpit. As the injured flier is unable to talk his feelings at the time can only be imagined, but he retained enough presence of mind to stay with his ship in the hope that some one may have witnessed the crash and come to his rescue.

In fact he stuck to his ship for twenty-seven hours, or until four o'clock on Tuesday afternoon, when he realized that his rescue largely depended upon himself and he decided to make the attempt while he had strength enough to do it. Picking out what he considered the most likely direction he started to crawl on his hands and knees, through thick and tangled underbrush and along rocky mountain slopes, and in this way he proceeded until it became so dark he could not see to go any further. But he was buoyed up by the fact that he was near enough to a public highway to hear motor cars passing. Time and again he called as loud as he could with his battered mouth but got no response, as his voice could not carry above the noise of the cars. He lay on the ground all night and with the first break of day on Wednesday morning again started his slow and painful crawl, finally reaching the detour which runs around the end of Jack's mountain, about three miles and a half above Potters Mills only a few minutes before Ralph Snyder and Russell Sweetwood came along in their car on their way to work on the state highway. The lieutenant had crawled between two and three miles, and it took him five hours and a half to do it.

Stopping their car they picked up the injured flier and putting him in the car brought him to the Centre County hospital. They had not heard of Lieut. Bettis being lost and thought the man a mail aviator until they reached the hospital. A physician was quickly summoned and Lieut. Bettis' injuries given proper attention. When brought to the hospital his clothing was all rain-soaked but he was fully conscious and has since continued so.

It is a matter of interest to note that when the lieutenant was brought to the hospital the physician summoned to attend to his injuries was Dr. Dale, who served as an army surgeon during the world war, being stationed at Evacuation hospital No. 8, in France. On Wednesday night Capt. A. W. Smith, of Philadelphia, who is the flight surgeon at the Sesqui-Centennial, arrived in Bellefonte, and went direct to the hospital to see Lieut. Bettis. The patient was somewhat restless during the fore part of Wednesday night but from eleven o'clock on to yesterday morning rested quite well.

On Wednesday E. L. Wilhelm, Walter S. Hamline, Jacob Miller and Guy M. Baumbach, four mechanics from the government flying field at Middletown, came to Bellefonte in a big army truck to remove the wrecked plane. The plane was equipped with two machine guns and those, as well as the valuable instruments, were removed on Wednesday by Lieut. Smith and brought to the Bellefonte flying field, while Snyder and Sweetwood, the men who brought Lieut. Bettis to the hospital, stood guard over the wreckage until it was removed.

Lieut. Bettis is a native of Carsonville, Mich., and has been stationed at the Sesqui in Philadelphia since May. He was the winner of the 1925 Pulitzer race and was returning to Selfridge field to take part in a cross-country flight. When he failed to reach Selfridge field by Tuesday morning two army fliers from Middletown were sent here to scour the mountains for the missing flier, and on Tuesday evening Lieuts. Smith and Williams returned here from Selfridge field and scouted over the Seven mountains until dark but failed to locate the wrecked plane.

As soon as Lieut. Smith was apprised of the extent of Lieut. Bettis' injuries on Wednesday morning, he accompanied Snyder and Sweetwood to the Seven mountains to retrieve the wrecked plane.

LIEUT. BETTIS TAKEN TO WALTER I. REED HOSPITAL, WASHINGTON, BY PLANE YESTERDAY.

In order that he may have the best possible care Lieut. Bettis was taken to the Walter I. Reed hospital, in Washington, yesterday. A big transport plane, of the Douglas C1 type, converted into a hospital ship, was sent here from Bolling field, reaching here shortly before ten o'clock in the morning. It was in charge of pilot Ira Eaker. Bettis was swung in a hammock to the top of the passenger department, the plane leaving the Bellefonte field at just exactly 12:42 o'clock. Capt. E. W. Smith, flight surgeon at the Sesqui grounds, in Philadelphia, had charge of the injured lieutenant on the trip to Washington.
