Beware of Chick Advertisements.

As a result of a study of more than 1000 baby chick advertisements appearing in 200 daily and weekly newspapers, farm journals and poultry magazines, the bureau of markets, Pennsylvania department of agriculture, has issued vigorous warning to all producers of baby chicks against the use of misleading statements in advertisements, and is urging buyers of chicks to beware.

Dozens of hatchery owners who are not co-operating with the State in its accredited hatchery work are making advertising statements about their chicks such as "free from disease," "free from bacillary white diarrhea," and "blood tested." In many cases the impression is left that these baby chicks are being produced under the supervision of the State.

The term "state accredited" is also used in a number of the advertisements. The buyer should make certain of the State referred to because the requirements for "accredited" baby chicks are different in different States. All producers of such chicks in Pennsylvania are required to use the term "Pennsylvania State accredited" in all advertisements.

Owners of flocks and hatcheries not co-operating with the Pennsylvania department of agriculture are prohibited from using terms such as "supervised," "certified," and "accredited" which are specified in the State regulations.

Buyers who want to make absolutely sure of the quality of chicks which they expect to buy should communicate with the bureau of markets at Harrisburg and ask for a complete list of all hatcheries and flocks operating under State supervision. This is the only safe plan to follow, according to bureau officials.
