Not One in Three Are Punished.

The first statistical survey on crime in Pennsylvania shows fewer than one of every three persons indicted for major offenses are being punish-

The findings, included in the report of the Legislature Crime Commission submitted to the General Assembly were based on investigations of the dispositions of 43,919 cases which had their origin in 1926. That was the last year in which a complete followup could be made of the indictments until the present, the report said.

"One thing is certain," the report continued, "either the police arrest on totally insufficient evidence or these lower courts though inefficiency or political expediency are failing lamentably in doing their duty to the public. A chain is as strong; as its weakest link, and the strength of criminal justice depends in large part on two links-its police and minor judiciary."

Violations of the prohibition laws were not included in the detailed study of a criminal case from its inception to disposition, "because this was too large a subject for us to undertake at this time," according to the report. It was found, however, that liquor law violators were the greatest single class of criminals to be remanded to grand juries.
