BELLEFONTE MAN INVENTS AN ELECTRIC LIME KILN.

Might Result in Building Plant to Manufacture Dry Ice.

Robert S. Walker, production manager at the Chemical Lime company plant, has invented an electric lime kiln and has an application for a patent now pending in the patent office in Washington. His invention is securely covered with fifty or more specifications covering every possible principle and point of the patent against infringement.

The ultimate purpose of the invention is not merely the burning of lime but the manufacture of dry ice, and if the inventor's plans work out in reality as they show up theoretically there is a possibility of a plant being erected in Bellefonte for manufacturing dry ice at a cost which will not be prohibitive to the public in general, and in quantities sufficient to make it a marketable product.

Limestone, and especially the high grade stone of Bellefonte and vicinity, is composed of but two major elements, lime and carbon-dioxide gas. Burning lime through the present every day process with wood and coal is merely a matter of drawing from the stone and burning up or throwing off into the atmosphere the carbon-dioxide gas.

Dry ice is manufactured from carbon-dioxide gas compressed to a density of 150 degrees F. below the freezing point. It is now manufactured in small quantities and its selling price is $26 per ton, which is prohibitive for general use. The carbon-dioxide gas thrown off by the present methods of burning lime is so impregnated with foreign matter from the coal or wood that the gas has to be washed and reworked before it can be used in making dry ice, and this is the costly part of manufacturing it.

With an electric kiln or furnace the limestone would be burned under a vacuum process and the carbon-dioxide gas would be drawn off by a suction pump, coming out of the furnace 99.9999 per cent pure, so that no washing would be necessary for the manufacture of dry ice. A temperature of 2600 degrees is required to burn lime by coal or wood while 1500 degrees of electric energy is all that would be required. According to Mr. Walker's calculations accompanying his application for a patent 100 tons of limestone would yield 60 tons of lime and 40 tons of dry ice.

Dry ice is so called because it does not melt, but evaporates, and in evaporating leaves no trace of wetness nor residue of any kind. A chunk of it the size of a brick would keep an ordinary refrigerator cold for forty-eight hours.

Mr. Walker has gone into the question of manufacturing dry ice very thoroughly and is convinced that with an electric kiln it could be manufactured at a cost which would make it a common marketable commodity. In fact he has assurance from the Knickerbacher Ice company, of New York, one of the largest refrigerating concerns in that city, as well as refrigerating companies in other cities that if he can manufacture dry ice at the right price they will be interested in giving his product a tryout in their business.

Mr. Walker's invention and pending patents are now under consideration by officials of the Chemical Lime company, in their head offices at Baltimore, and while so far there is no definite assurance that a plant will be built here to test the merits of the invention, there is a possibility that such might be the case. As the invention is exclusively that of Mr. Walker, and the Chemical company does not decide to make the test, he will likely have the right to take it elsewhere.

Work on the new Lamb street bridge does not seem to be progressing very rapidly but that is because the building of the abutments is a part of the work that cannot be rushed.
