Obituary. Lines written on the death of Gertrude, Seldon and Cullie, children of Jas, A. Fortune They faded-oh ! how soon they died. Ere summer bloomed upon life's way,

Those little spring buds, side by side, Were culled -as in one single day. Yes, plucked so early by that hand, Whose chilling touch and withering breath Not e'en the hoary heads will stand ; So they, dear ones, were stilled in death.

Dear Gertie-fond and loving child-Was first to close her bright dark eyes : Her rosy lips so recent smiled,

Were sealed-she felt nor heard our cries. 'Twas noonday-oh ! that bitter hour ; And theagh the bright May sun was high, His beams were shut from that sweet flower ; So beautiful-yet she must die.

Low whisperings tended 'round another, While still the solemn hush was felt-Was next that infant son and brother, 'Round whom to save, in tears they knelt. Twas vain; the shadows hovered low; With dimpled hands upon his breast, So calmy, gently, seemed to go, -

And Seldon, too, was hushed to rest. Then sorrow's darkness draped the day, And found hearts broken, weeping o'er

Two treasures hidden in the clay. Unconsious, death still claims one more; And oh! but two short weeks were given To linger where the weary roam, When two sweet angels, back from heave

Were sent, to bear dear Callie home. Now those beloved ones, low are laid, Beneath the early flowers of spring. As side by side their graves are made,

I can but memory's offering bring-With sympathy for those, that day, A sad bereavement called to mourn.

Who stood beside the lifeless clay And asw them to the dark grave borne. Oh! then 'twas hard to bear I know---But think, there's one that's strong to save Who took them from this world of wee,

In rescue from life's storiny wave. 🚍 Twas such our Savior kindly took, And pressed them gently to his breast, And promised in his holy book. All such in him should find a rest.

Nor think the cold relentless grave Exultant feels o'er gems we've lost. 'Twas not to death alone we gave, Bat unto God, who counts the cost. 'Tis here the remnant only lies, While we in joy look up to heaven. Immortal is the soul that fies Back to its God, of whom 'twas given.
