It was afternoon, the place was crowded with promenaders, the air was balmy, and the sun was going down behind the hills, leaving the sky radiant with golden light. Harley made some boyish reply, and the filrtation continued.

'Who is that girl?' asked a lady of a gentleman as they passed the handsome cadet and his companion.

'She is the wealthy Miss Levering, of New York, the protege of Colone!

Harley did not sleep that night. He toesed restlessly hour after hour, thinking over his interview with Miss Levering. 'She must like me,' he argued—'I am sure she does; while I—I love her!' And the poor boy did not exaggerate. 'Louise had fuscinated—captivated him. 'How beautiful she is!' thought the cadet, 'and what a sweet voice!' Then he paused, while a thrill ran through him. 'She is very wealthy, and I—well, I am not poor—my father is prosperous and—I could support a—a wife!' Ah, Harley, thinking of marriage already—before you have graduated! How fast boys run oh—American boys especially! How bright the skies are to youthful eyes! A storm may come—but at the first gllimpse of sunshine the gloomy past is forgotten and hope smiles once more. Harley felt sure Miss Levering liked him very much—for had she not asked him to be her friend—and had he not fulfill it nobly?

He fell asleep at last and dreamed of her—dreamed that she called him 'Dear Harley,' and told him that she loved him, and awoke with a start just as the receille sounded. He was in earnest, but Miss Levering thought it was an excuse for a continuation of the filtration, which, inasmuch as she had only known him three or four days, was advancing in a wild and wonderful manner; s. she said, 'Yes,' and went off without noticing her mother's warning: Louise, you had better take your shawl. The evening dew will soon fall.'
'Manuma is so stupid,' she said, as 'they crossed the green sward.
Harley looked surprised, but said nothing, and she rattled on.
'Is not the sunset sublime? Oh, I' could gaze at it forever!'
'I think it would hardly consent to that next arrangement,' replied Harley practically.
