In 1816, while William I., of Hesse diffilks and one of whose best customs of the reforms one of his ministers received the following letter from England:

"A brave man, a nativated Effector all Hesse, Serving in the English army is a mounter of the German Legion, and as an intilleryman, swed at the battle of Waterloo an English battery. All the artilleryman inducen shortdown, and a French regithe battle of Waterloo an English battery. All the artillery men indices shot down, and a French regiment of cuirassirs rushed on the battery with the wildest fary. The valiant man, who, unassisted, had load all the pieces with grapeshot, fearlessly selzed the match, and with the rapidity of lighting hurled the whole fire of the battery at the approaching horsemen. So frightful was the shaughter that the regiment broke and fied. Hereby the English grenadiers gained time to secure the battery which had been defended by the intropidity of a single man. England delights in being grateful, but on this occasion was unable to recompense adequately, or at all, a distinguished service. The German Legion was a horizontal one."

When then I returned to the battery, I threw myself down hesidaone of the guns, and lay asstill as a stone and a control of the guns, and lay asstill as a stone of the guns of the g the grievous regree was at one dis-covered. "The traces which we found of the fight along the front of Hancock's and Sedgewick's line—except in the blasted peach orchard—were not very distinct, owing to the growing fields of grain and the repairs which have been put upon the few farm houses. But the graves of the rebel dead are there, dotting the fields for miles around. In one or two places the bones were sticking out, but generally their graves were covered with clover, and had none of that barbarously neglected appearance they have in the South.

But what could the babies do to the kittens, in the barrel? Surely, they could not get at them there! I soon found out. There was a box of lime, half air slaked, in an obscure corner of the barn, and the little, sharp eyes had found it, and, standing on tiptoe, the little hands could just reach over the edge of the barrel. So they proceeded to "peed kitty." Patter, patter, went the small feet across the barn floor, and again and again handfuls of the lime were scattered in upon the poor kittens, Their poor little eyes were filled, and they were mewing piteously. I caught them up, and tried to blow the lime away. But no, it stuck fast. Then I ran for some milk, to wash it out, pondering as I ran.
