around my breast, and, loosing the narrow part of the ice, and here he stopped and looked up with a forlorn face to me; but as he climbed over the edge of the broad summit...

There were no boys now. So there can be no more men. We have had and young masters, but no boys. Year ago, when America could boast of statesmen, there were boys all over the country--rugged, lively, and bold.

Boys were scarce. I had had my share of boys in my life, and I had seen them in every part of the world. I had seen them in the mountains of the Alps, in the valleys of the Rhine, and in the forests of the Pyrenees.

Few writers in the English language have been more read and admired than Sir Walter Scott. His poetical writings, in sentiment, in beauty of diction, in vivacity of imagery, and in power of description, are not surpassed by those of any poet of the present or the last century.

What a complete and vivid picture is drawn in these four lines of good, simple Anglo-Saxon; how plainly and how brightly the picture is drawn in the four lines of good, simple Anglo-Saxon!

What a vivid picture of a splendid sunset is drawn in these four lines of good, simple Anglo-Saxon; how plainly and how brightly the picture is drawn in the four lines of good, simple Anglo-Saxon!

As often as the music has been heard, comparatively few know that in the second stanza of the "Lady Eglar" the poet has found the most beautiful examples of woman's love and sympathy for the world that can be found in the whole of English Literature. I quote only four lines:

No more radiant and noble soul than that contained in the four lines, was ever penned by uninspired man.

Study for a moment the following picture from the second stanza of the third canto:

There is no form of Lung Disease which cannot be cured by a resort to Dr. Keyser's Lung Cure. Let it be understood that it strengthens and not a weak medicine, that in no case of diphtheria or croup, or any other disease of the throat, it is not to be used.

Dr. Keyser examines all his cases before treatment with his Lung Cure, the most perfect and most successful remedy for consumption.
