Now, this is really too absurd.-Here is a man who dies in New Jersey, and the telegraph attempts to define him as "the owner of a building in which General Washington had his headquarters." There is no American schoolboy who has not known one or more men who had lived in a house that had been General Washington's headquarters. The General had more headquarters during his service in the field than any other General of ancient or modern times. It appears to have been his habit to visit every pleasant locality in the country, and immediately build a house as his headquarters. He must have built them, for there are more "headquarters of Washington" now in existance than there were houses standing in the country at the time of the Declaration of Independ-
