Personal Reminiscences of the "Cameron Ring" Plots and Counterplots. A correspondent of the New York Sun lately sought out General Irwin, late State Treasurer, at his home near Brighton, in Beaver county, and recites the following as the result of an interview with him. Speaking of the election for United States Senator in the spring of 1869, he says: "Just before the Legislature n s mbled, sometime during the holidays, I was in Harrisburg, and while I was at the depot a messenger from General Cameron found me, and said I was wanted up in the railroad oftice very much. I went up to Don Cameron's rooms over the depot, and there I found Simon and Don, The old man opened the conversation by saying, that they wanted to make some arrangement with meabout the State moneys. If I would dismiss Mr. Taggart, my cashier, and take a man he would name, and give his there banks control of the money in the Treasury they would not oppose

They had a Senatorial fight on on hard, and they would rather be him as an honest man and an able on good terms with me, if it was possible. I replied that I had always treated them as I had other citizens of the Commonwealth; that their banks had received all that I considered them entitled to. I was not disposed to dismiss Mr. Taggart who had proved himself a capable and honest man, to take one of his creatures; and I thought he was demanding rather too much for his friendship. Cameron replied, that they could use a great deal of money in their railroad and iron works; that they had had that accommodation from the Treasurer, and they must have it in the future. They could
