and so often since, I had not seen her long, before I found that I trusted her as implicitly as she did me; indeed there was not a man who worked on the farm who had not absolute confidence in the child, or was not sure of her promptness, punctuality, and affection. Nor was it men and women alone who felt so. The horses and the cows-nay, the pigs and the hens-all knew her cheerful voice and her ready attendance and her steady hand. Jotham said she could collar and harness that cross brute "Mad March;" that she would climb into the manger and put the wretch's collar on, and put the bit in his mouth, because she was such a lady. I know she could do it; and of course Mad March let her do it, for he could have eaten her, had he been carnivorous, and hardly know he had tasted food. But it was not because she was a

all. trusted her so entirely that they came to pick the red berries which were printed chair, down the wharf and upon the on her muslin dress; and, when they deck; and Janet came with her, and found they could not get any of them off, skirt, thinking they should get at the berries on the other side. I have seen the little birds do that with Janet-not such wrens as those because there are none in Maine, but some little witches not so much bigger than an English wren, they knew Janet, even if she did not know their name, nor they hers.

The pretty picture Mr. Billings made of her just represents both sides. I mean she trusted the birds, and the birds trusted her. In the picture you see just how it was. This little whistler has fascinat. ed him. He knows she will not hurt him; and it almost seems as if she were listening to him, and learning from him, as in the "Arabian Nights" and in the German fairy tales, the girls of the real blue blood understand the language of caterpillar, cricket, grasshopper, toad, frog, wessel, pussy cat, tom tit, ostrich, cameleopard, and all other vertebrates or good a fairy as the best of them !

After the haymow flight, when she was as big a girl as Mr. Billings has made her, we had many a tramp together upbrook, through moose-wood and over mountain. I have seen her pass from rock to rock, on one of the ridges of Ktashn, with no thought of taking a staff, with no kind of uneasiness, though she was just on the sheer edge of the prec | far, far away.

went ahead of the party. Poor Trevor was released in less than two hours from the time he fell.

But you want to know how Wildair first met him. It is John Wildair remember-not Taylor; Taylor is in Australia. John is Taylor's brother. That is just the way with you young people. All you care about is love making and the wedding. Now, I might entertain you for an hour with pleasant accounts of how the Trevors came into the Piscataquis valley, and how I came to be there, and of the origin of the Trevor family; and you would skip it all to see how the story turned out, and who married them. Only Helen, of all of you, would read about the early history of Cornwall; and she would do it, not because she wanted to know, but from love of me.

Well, John Wildair first saw Janet on lady, but because her easy confidence, board a Kennebec steamer, literally on as I say, created the same confidence in | board, if you will rightly consider the derivation of that term. John Wildair - Do you remember Miss Yonge's pretty | was sitting on the deck, at Bath, watchstory of Miss Keble! The little wrens ing as the passengers came on board. And two men brought an old lady, in a wrapped her up warm, and coddled her, they flew down and crept up under the and made her feel quite at home. Then the old lady wished she had some of the oranges which a German woman was selling on the wharf; and Janet ran ashore to buy them. While the German fiddled about the change, the boat cast off, the captain's bell struck, and they had fairly pulled the gangway in, when Janet came > running back with her fruit. Did she stop? Not she!

"Please run it on again," she said : and the wharf hands obeyed her, just as Dan obeyed her in the pasture. And the little bird, as I called her before, ran right over the board, the boat moving the end along steadily as she did so, and sprang upon the deck, as perfectly unconscious as it she had been walking the floor. Years after John Wildair tried to make her remember it; but she did not remember it at all; said, indeed, there was nothing to remember. She said there was no danger, and consequently no courage; that find out. Why was he afraid? Why? invertebrates. Dear little Janet, she is as the plank would remain on the boat fully five seconds, and the slowest women in Christendom could have crossed in two. Still John Wildsir wondered when he saw her do it : and, as I believe, admired her then and there, that she did not spend ten seconds first in inquiries of the wharf men whether or no it would be assigned to Lynchburg. safe to cross the gangway.

But John was destined te see her again in one hospital and another, appointed herself to duty one day at Hospital No. 21, with a note from Dr. Macgregor to our good friend, Dr. Sample, who was in charge there. The note said that she was a perfect nurse, and could speak French and German well. Sample had little to do with French or with German, but he had no surplus of perfect nurses. And so it was, that, one morning when Tom Trevor was waiting for his breakfast of mush and molasses, it was brought to him, not by the nice red turbaned black woman who brought it Monday, but by a tiny little white woman in the full dress of a sister of charity. Tom hopped a foot off from his bed when the sister of chari.  $G_{\rm LITSCH'S IMPERIAL RESSIAN MUSTARD.}$  $G_{\rm Wholesale to the trade.}$  Single cans sent, post paid, on receipt of \$1. W. HERMAN T. FRUEAUFF, Reading, Pa. ty turned round on him; but the sister of charity magnetized Tom also, so that his "Janet!" died unspoken. But from that moment, I can tell you, Tom began to get well:

So did John Wildair, who lay in the next bed; and so did all the Smiths and the Joneses and the rest, with whom this story has nothing to do. Never was there such a sunshiny place as that ward of No. 21, till they were all packed off, and sent back into the country.

And then ! Why, by that time, Mille. Lacretelle had her way as perfectly as any red tapist of them all. Not Dr. Sample sitions with more formality, insist on precedent more precisely, or do as he chose more certainly, than could the French nurse. She never asked for anything  $\nabla$ that was not right; and, when she asked for anything, she asked as if she were certain it was to be granted. So the end was, that it always was granted. Tom Trevor was assigned to Lynchburg. Dear me! how John Wildair would have given his haad had he dared asked her to assign him to Lynchburg. And the only reason he did not dare was his fear that she would find out, by his asking, how it was a matter of life and death for him to go there. Queer human nature ! He hoped she knew she was all in all to him and yet that was the one thing he did \$5 not tell her, and was so afraid she would Oh! it is the old, old story. What if she did find out, and then moved Tom into ward A, and let Rebecca come into ward B. in her place, what would John Wil dair do then, poor thing? So John Wil-

	fifty miles away. Yes, and I have seen it fifty miles away. Yes, and I have seen the child's father fell a pine tree a hun- dred and fifty years old, that we might welk dry-shod across the stream; and the moment it fell little Janet was the first to swing herself upon the trunk, to run across as lightly as one of her own little hirds would, and in ten seconds was beconing and waving her hands from the rocks on the other shore. We could not hear a word she said for the rush of the rapids in the gorge below. Her father, who worships her,—as well he may—used to tell a story of an experience of theirs in a sort of outlaying station he had, half shanty and half lumber camp, just on the edge of the woods. Mrs. Trevor had gone up with him and Janet and the children;	wild-cat, black-haired brother that dared everything, and went everywhere. And after that horrid carnage at Bell's Ford, when the lists of the Forty seventh were printed. Tom's name was among the miss- ing. Dead perhaps? Janet said, "No, not dead." She was sure he was not dead. If he had been shot, some man would have seen him fall, and would have told it, for they all liked Tom. No; Janet, with all her own clear sightedness, which is what Mr. Billings and I call "Confidence," pronounced that he was in a rebel prison. Her father would not hear of it; for, as I said, he worshipped Janet. But, because people are fain to	him thirty miles before daylight. Then he slept all day in a barn; then he stole an- other horse, and then another; and so he turned up at Harper's Ferry; and so he was in Battery Seven in front of Peters- burg; and so he marched under Ord to Appomattox Court House; and so, when Janet brought poor Tom, still limping down to our lines, and hunted up the Forty-seventh Maine, John Wildair was in command, because he ranked every of- ficer left in the field. And did not John Wildair tell her then how glad he was to see her ! Yes. And she was glad to see him ! And John had her and Tom sent back to the field hospital in an old carryall, and in the evening came down to see how.
