HISTORY OF THE BEAVER VAL-LEY.

Correspondence of the Pittsburgh Gazette. BEAVER VALLEY, April, 1873. [Paper No. 10.]

THE ROCHESTER OF TO-DAY is a pleasantly situated borough of over 2,000 inhabitants, and in point of location, the varied character of its scenery, and advantageous location for business, is unexcelled. The older and more business portion of the town is located on a flat forming the banks of the Ohio river and skirting at points on the Beaver river. Here the manufactories and shops are found making music by their incesbeautiful little homes that cover the hill town, men who have worked hard and will work hard in the future for the advancement of their town, but the number is not large enough to meet the wants of the place. Put on those flats and hills the men and capital that other towns not far off have, and it would eclipse anything that the valley has ever seen. In saying in this letter what has been noted down, it is not to be supposed that a fraction of what Rochester is and may be has been touched or spoken of. To say all that could be said, would trespass the limits of a few letters, but opportunity may be had again, to speak of one other pressing want of the town, which cannot hear be dwelt upon, and that is its consolidation with others of its neighbor towns.
