Green Manures for Poor Lands.

Perhaps nothing in the whole province of farming engrosses so much the attention of those interested, as the question of preserving or increasing the fertility of the soil. There are several reasons for this, independent of the ever existing necessity for supplying farming land with properties taken from it by unjust cultivation. They are, first, the great quantity of worn-out land, once fertile and productive, and made unproductive by the rapid growth of population, and the growing demand for the products of the farm; and, second, the soil of inferior quality brought into cultivation from year to year, by reason of the same necessity. Land that has been worked to death, and left to lie as waste, must be restored to fertility, and that which has never been productive must be made so, in order to become profitable. It is not so difficult to make worn-out and barren land produce good crops, as one would suppose from a hasty view of the innumerable failures to be seen all around. If the beneficial properties to grow crops are not in soil, it is vain to sow, and plant, without first putting them there; or if they are there, but locked up, without making first the necessary conditions to release them, and give them vitality. Every observing farmer knows that it is far easier to produce grass than wheat, and a common remark among farmers is, "if I can raise a crop of clover I can raise wheat."

One of the means of raising land to get it to produce clover, and plow it down when in full bloom. But clover contains a large percentage of potash, and in soils already abundantly supplied with this, such as late and shale lands it is better to mix the clover with other grasses. Mixed grasses have all the fertilizing properties of barn-yard manure; and this furnishes a satisfactory reason why old meadows and sod fields yield so abundantly when farmed. Farmers know that old sod field farmed in corn yields the largest crops, and the best crops of wheat are raised from it. Why? The field has been lying until different kinds of grasses have grown up, each one gathering different substances from the atmosphere, and carrying them down into the soil through the roots, and enriching it. Hence when a crop of corn, or wheat is planted all the substances necessary for its growth and perfect development have been provided for its use.

By the application of lime on such soil the decomposition of fibrous matter in the soil is hastened, and they are converted into plant food. It too much is applied, a heavy growth of straw is produced, and it will grow so rank as to lodge and yield very little grain. By using a smaller quantity of lime, so as to make a healthy growth of straw, the heads will fill and the grain mature; for it is found that when the straw does not make an overgrowth the head generally fills perfectly. The object to be sought is to know what elements are needed in the soil, and in what conditions, to produce the crop we wish to grow. There is no doubt that if we should give to the soil all the constituents of the crop, each year, we could always count with reasonable certainty on a large yield. Were the constituent elements of wheat inexhaustible in the soil, we might sow and reap, year after year, without diminution in the yield or quality. On the contrary they are easily exhausted, and unless supplied, it is not long until we can raise no crop at all.

Wheat contains lime, soda and chlorine. Soda and chlorine make common salt. The sowing of common salt on wheat fields must be advantageous. It is believed to strengthen the straw and make it hard, thus preventing rust. Rust appears only on straw of a soft, luxuriant growth, which cracks open easily, leaving the juice to ooze out and escape. The action of the hot sun and moisture upon this, readily produces rust. Especially is this the case with wheat grown in low soil where the dampness is great.

The never failing quantity of plant-food floating in the atmosphere is ever available for promoting the growth and development of plants. In its availability there is a marked difference between that in the air and the vegetable nutrient locked up in the soil. The atmosphere is sure to nourish growing plants whenever the tender leaves open their pores to take in the nourishment it furnishes. It builds up the stem and develops the various parts of the plant. Not so with the roots of the plant. It may send forth its rootlets in every direction, seeking food, and yet furnish, drop and die, because the vegetable matter is not in an available condition to promote its growth. As it is impossible for every farmer to get stable manure in sufficient quantity to enrich his land, he must look to the great vegetable manure supplied by nature. It is the principle source of manure on the earth, and as such it must be applied by the farmer if he would secure his own greatest advancement. By green manures, of course is meant, vegetable manures plowed down. By this method the soil will receive all, and more than is taken from it, for it receives in addition to the accumulated properties generated by light, air, heat and water, which are inexhaustible in nature, and constant. Observing farmers are well aware that green manures fructify the soil, and that it pays best to plow down clover, mixed grasses, oats, buckwheat and corn. They should not fear to lose a crop of hay, or miss a crop of oats, or rye, or buckwheat by so doing, for the sacrifice of one crop will enable them to raise half a dozen crops with profit. Every few years green crops should be plowed down, in the absence of barnyard manure. It will keep up the fertility of the soil, as nothing else will, and enriches him who does it, as well as his land. — Experimental Farm Journal.
