FARMERS' HOMES.

BY ALEXANDER HYDE, LEE, MASS, We know of no country where the homes of the laboring classes, and especially of the farming community, are equal to those of

New England. There is an air of neatness and comfort about them which we look for in vain elsewhere. We find better land and better barns in other countries, but our houses, our homes, as a whole, are superior. This is our homes, as a whole, are superior. This is doubtless the result of a higher civilization, the legitimate fruit of intellectual and moral culture. It may seem vain glorious for us to say so, and we should not venture on the as-sertion, did not the testimony of foreigners universally strengthen the conviction of our own observations. Lord Morpeth, on his visit to America was struck with admiration The fault probably is not so much with the of the comfortable homes of the farmers of New England. The English system of large landed proprietors farming out their lands to tennant, is not conducive to the cultivation of the home feeling, nor to permanent improvethe nome feeling, nor to permanent improve ments. The signification of the word farm in Great Britain, is land leased, and a farmer is a mere tenant of the proprietor. Our New England mode of dividing the land into small tracts, each owned in fee simple by the occu-pant, is far preferable, stimulating not only to the better cultivation of the soil, and the parental roof with regret and return to it with erection of better buildings, but what is of far higher value, to self respect and love of home love of country will be equalled only by their and country. As far as lordships are con-corned we are far better off in this country than the English, for we have a hundred landlords to England's one, and the genius of our institutions favors the idea of every man's being not only a landlord but a nobleman The New England system of small farms is also far preferable to the Southern mode of large plantations. At the South, with a thousand acres of land, we find one man with many servants, while here, with the same amount of blow. land, we have at least ten men, who by their intelligence and virtue are worthy of the name. As a consequence we have ten houses at the North to one at the South, and villages, schools and churches in like proportion. The Southerner, as he travels North for the first time, is struck with nothing so much as with the multiplicity of villages, farms and school houses, and whoever has traversed the Poto mac and Connecticut valleys, must have con trasted the paucity and poverty of the homes in the former, with their multiplicity and com fort in the latter. But however much reason we have to congratulate ourselves upon our pleasant and comfortable rural homes, there is a margin for still further improvement. The spacious painted, tidy farm houses, surrounded by lawns and groups of trees, though as weaffirm more numerous in New England than in any other land, are not as numerous as we could wish. We also pass many large, well built houses, evidently the homes of thrifty farmers, but with a bleak desolate air, for the want of a few shade trees, or a green velvet turf around them. We never pass such a house without wishing to stop and say to the proprietor, that at the expense of a few dollars we can make the market value of his house many hundreds more, and add intrinsically to its worth as a place of abode, if he does not desire to sell it. A few elms and pines, which two men can transplant in a day, will give a cheerful aspect to many a desolate looking home. It is a mistaken idea that we must purchase Norway Spruce, or Scotch Larches with which to adorn our grounds. There are no better ornamental shade trees in the wide eight gallon keg, said he didn't mind the world than are to be found in our own forests. We do not sufficiently prize the blessings that are near us, and are apt to overlook the beau-ty of the objects to which our eyes are accus-

to med. We remember well the time when we saw no special beauty in the graceful deep-green foliage of the hemlock. The truth is we had been accustomed to see it all around our path, from childhood, and to hear it spo-ken of with contempt, and we thought it must be contemptible, but we are grateful that we IN the depths of the sea the waters are sti have outlived such childish notions. We will the depins of the set ne waters are still also to say in passing, that in building out houses, even the most elegant ones, we need the purest joy is unspeakable; the most im not go to the West Indies for mahogony, nor pressive prayer is silent; and the most solemn to Florida for yellow pine. One of the best preacher at a funeral is the silent one whose uilt houses we ever saw, was made entirely

Place the house some distance from the highway, it possible, on an eminence, so as to overlook the surrounding country, and by all means have a grass plot, if not a lawn, in front of it. Noth-ing is more pleasing to the eye than the To commission on per centage..... To John Wilkinson, bond and interest not paid To current expenses at home not paid... green, velvety carpet of grass, with which nature covers and aderns the surface of the earth.
