For the Young Folks.

Kicking up your Own Dust. One evening Frank and George Gardner came home from school, both looking a little "out of sorts." Their Uncle Charles was sitting in the shade of the great elm at the corner of the house...

"What for instance?" asked his uncle. "Well, sir, almost everything. In the first place, when I was milking this morning, old Spot kicked over the pail...

"But I don't want to ask you one more question about the 'boy.' Don't you think he acted foolishly and wrong?" Frank was silent; but George said, "Yes, sir," very promptly...

"Now Farmer Aliquis's pasture was next to Doctor Quidam's, with only a rough fence between them; and so, when the horses were unharmed and turned out...

"Why, I didn't think but that it was a pretty nice sort of a day; and, indeed, I didn't think of its being so very dusty. To be sure, I saw a good deal of dust in the road; but it didn't fly much while I went by..."

"I feel more like eating than talking," said Tom. "I don't know why, but I just now feel more like eating than talking..."

"I don't see what I saw and heard on my morning before school-time. As I was going out with my milk pail on my arm, I saw past his usual milking time..."

each person is to see where the truth lies some one else. "Well," he continued, "then the boy led the pony out to the pump. Pony didn't seem in so great a hurry to drink as the boy did to do so; and so the boy kicked at her, and said, 'Drink, you old rascal!'..."
