The Ritzer Von Schwarzenfels. A LEGEND OF THE RHINE.

In many a strife and many a fight Had the Ritzer Von Schwarzenfels fought, And in deeds and in wars on his helmet lars Were the tales of his combats wrought.

He had slain more men, he had stolen more gold, He had drunk more sparkling wine, And had uttered more oaths and had broken more vows Than did a knight on the Rhine.

He had hated the church, and he hated the State, And he swore by the power of night, That he never would bow to Pope or to King So long as his sword was bright.

Perched on a crag mid the drifting clouds, The outlaw had bided his rest, And he saw the sun gleam from north to south, And the valley from east to west.

Over the river he stretched a chain, And the boats that passed each day, Before they could get from golden gulf, Were forced a tribute to pay.

One year from his stronghold he sallied forth, And the head of a hundred men, And a plian with spoils from rich and poor, Came back to his tower again.

Not a pilgrim knocked at his castle gate, Not a traveler asked to stay; But each crossed himself when he saw the tower, Then hastily sped on his way.

And more than a score of hardy knights, Who had sworn to follow him, Of his fearful curse had fallen beneath, The stroke of the robber's hand.

Thus long had he lived and loathed he laughed Both at God and to God's word, And he declared with the fiercest of German oaths, That he a sovereign was born.

Bright burn the lights in the banquet hall, And loud groaned the tables with cheer, And the wine was quaffed from golden cups, That were stolen from afar.

Then upon the Ritzer, and in his hand Held a dragon of choice Moselle, And rapping his sword on the fallen board, Said in a voice from heaven's height:

"Not one," cried he, "have I ever found Who was stronger or braver than I; There exists not a being on earth or in Hell Who would dare say challenge reply."

"It is false," said a figure full now unseen, Who had stepped from the banquet room, Then the lights grew dim, and the air grew cold, The hall seemed wrapped in gloom.

"I come to avenge each pillaged shrine, This stranger gaily said, And in answer to prayers from east and west, That loudly my aid invoke."

"I have listened oft to thy boastful speech, And have followed thee to the Rhine, To dare thus to draw thy sword on mine, And to measure thy strength with mine."

"Brave thou art, by my faith, I trow; The Ritzer with rage leapt, And saw thyself a man, And draw thy blade, And show thyself a man."

In the deepening gloom the Ritzer fought, And labored hard for longest time, "Thine own," said the stranger, "to strive with me, For I am thy conqueror—Death!"

And the throngs within their castles walls, And the monks in their lonely cells, Thanked Him who had sent his servant—Death— To vanquish bold Schwarzenfels.
