BROCKLEBANK'S TENT.

By

The first moment before us calm, and quiet and motionless like the next morning, that I could remember had my dream. I had lain down at nine or after a hearty breakfast and went over to Langford's tents, for he had promised to allow me how to make a damper. I was agreeably surprised to find that my little tent was not to be Langford himself, for he had gone off to work, but his wife. She was a comely, lady-like young woman, who I have said and seems to be in a little hesitation to expose to the very rough and ready life in her person. We got on very pleasantly together, and I remember practical lesson in the art of cooking, being bent on immediately superseding the avocation of my self, I started off to the Camp, where all the principal stores were situated, about two miles distant,—and there purchased a pick, a shovel, a tin dish, and sundry other useful paraphernalia appertaining to the craft of gold-mining. Choosing a supposed spot,—for I felt a little ashamed of working all to myself,—I set to work tearing away the surface soil, breaking up the gravel and clay, and then carefully washing it by means of my tin dish, for a pool close at hand. I worked with extreme vigor during the whole of the remainder of the day till the sun was almost setting, insomuch that I forgot all about dinner, and satisfied myself with a piece of bread which I had in my pocket. I then returned to Iron Bark Gully with the glittering treasures which my industry had secured carefully wrapped in a piece of newspaper. There was a good deal of it, but it appeared to me very light. "Perhaps, however," I remarked to my innocent self, "Australian gold is lighter than other gold." I afterwards discovered that my hoarded treasure consisted of nothing more precious than minute particles of mica, a glittering substance very abundant on the diggings.

I then did the Royal Liver Store just as the sun was at the moment of setting, rose me from beneath a huge bank of purple clouds, and illuminated all the things green trees with a glorious golden radiance. I never in this people, so beautiful as it is, with such a sense of loneliness; it recalls such moments to my life.

A group of some dozen persons were assembled round the smouldering logs in front of the store, apparently in earnest and excited conversation. I at once recognised Brocklebank, Langford, and my evil genius, Fry.

I approached, and as I drew near Fry left the group and came forward to meet me. He did not vouchsafe a word in answer to my salutation, but with his face white, which, however, I could not see, I told you, I knew nothing of the

As the words were uttered, I observed that all the company had their eyes fixed upon me, and their gaze was returned by me, and being of a naturally irritable character, I immediately after [illegible] Brocklebank laid his hand on Langford's arm, and whispered something in his ear. Langford [illegible] and addressed me

"Mr. Parker, I've something very painful to tell you. For the last two nights you have slept in Brocklebank's tent—"

"Yes," I replied in a few tone, fearing that something dreadful was coming

"I'm sorry to tell you that Mr. Brocklebank, on counting his gold to-day, found one packet deficient. There were twenty-seven parcels, and now there are only twenty-six. A packet containing seven hundred pennyweights, and marked one hundred [illegible]

In reply to these words Mr. Fry [illegible] one of the coarsest faces I ever remembered to have seen in the busy town of Liverpool
