THE SQUEAKER.

A Yankee of inventive mind, Observing once that woman-kind Were blessed with rather larger waists Than seemed to ladies' taste, Planned out and made of polished steel, With many a secret spring and wheel, A queer machine to work a cure, And altogether perfect care.

On every waist that might not be Of small or medium size, His great machine at last complete, He advertised in many a sheet, In this poetic style: "Attention, ladies, all and see The wonder of the country! My patent Waist Squeaker, The ladies' loving squire!"

Got up and ran by James Kile," Then, seated in his office at his ease, He waited for a waister to arrive, He had not very long to wait, For soon a maiden dressed in state, With ruffling robes and smile serene, Came in to try the great machine.

And thrusting off her furs and hat, With silent resignation sat, And soon she was in the chair, And all around her curious looks, And all around her curious looks, And all around her curious looks,

Then turned the crank; the springs gave way; She smiled with pure delight, And turned the crank again, and then He turned the polished crank again; She smiled again, and whispered low, "My dear James, how do you like this?"

He turned again, she murmured "oh!" He turned again, she murmured "oh!" He turned again, she murmured "oh!"

He turned again, she murmured "oh!" He turned again, she murmured "oh!" He turned again, she murmured "oh!"
