

THE YOUNG FOLKS.

HANNES-JACOB OF HOPPAOH.

From the German.

There is a story told of a tailor in Nonstadt on the Aisch, who, when the city was besieged by an enemy, and all men reduced by delivering it. He assumed himself up in a sheep skin, and showed himself on the city walls, in various places, while his comrades looked lustily below, in concert with him—until at last the enemy, thinking that the town must be abundantly supplied with food, withdrew in great excitement. The Nonstadt tailor was a clever fellow, but he had his match in Hannes-Jacob of Hoppaoh.

On the way from Eschun to Hoppaoh you pass a high, steep mountain—on this mountain stood the castle of Wildenstein. No part of it now remains standing, except a great wall, and the gate, which was formerly provided with a draw-bridge, together with a high four cornered tower; the collar is still to be seen in the yard, and a deep well, which is now quite filled up with stones. A century ago, hunter and shepherd still dwelt in the castle—since that time it lies waste and forsaken; the goats in the court yard; the wind and the birds have sown fir-trees and weeds and bushes on the masonry, and grass covers the road that led to the spot.

The Counts of Reineck, who long ago inhabited this castle, would scarcely have believed that the place would ever be desolate—unless, perhaps, we except the last of the race, who when all his retainers had either fled or been killed, tried to escape, with his chaplain, by a subterranean passage, but when he reached the outlet, at the place called the "Bath-room," already beset by the enemy, threw himself upon his sword.

The Count of Reineck had long been rich and powerful nobles, with gold and goods, and rich lands enough; to-day, even, one might find enough of gold and silver in the ruined castle, if one only knew how and where it hid. As it is, there it will lay until the day of doom.

But money and goods do not always save; and an ingenious mind is worth far more than gold and silver; as those nobles once proved by experience, in the course of their quarrels with the men of Mentz. The latter had occupied all the surrounding country, so that one of the Reineckers crossed in the court house, they might not grow stiff and awkward, held carnival in the great castle-hall, and waited for better times. But when the snow melted, and the mountain streams came down, and just at the time for the March vied to blow, he lighted one fine evening, the Mentzers came in great crowds into the valley, and encamped before the castle—and the Reineckers opened their eyes in astonishment. True, they had force enough, and the walls were high and the moat deep—but they were badly off for provisions, and well they knew that when the stomach is empty, the heart loses its courage, and the arm its strength. At first they hoped that they could come down to quarter relations; but his hand in vain against their thick wall, he would leave again—but the trees were disappointed; the larch trees grew green, and the birches put on their leaves, and the pines and firs showed new shoots, and the cuckoo commenced his cry—but after, as before, lay the Mentzers in the valley, and the smoke rose from their camp, three times every day exactly as it had been at home. It was a bitter sight to the Reineckers to see the men of Mentz gather morning, noon and night around the field-kettle, for Schmaltzen the niggard had long been head-cook among them—meat and flesh were scarce, and although they would have taken no great arithmetician to reckon within a hair's breadth, when the last loaf of bread was baked, and the last ham cut. What vexed the Reineckers most, was that the enemy must in some way have learned their condition. For when the Count and his servant, Hannes-Jacob, were once looking over the castle wall into the valley, they heard the Mentzers saying: "They have only one cow and one pig—the rest will soon be ours!"

As has been intimated, Hannes-Jacob had a fertile brain. Over in the valley lay Hoppaoh. People say that once upon a time a man came into the valley, with a bag on his shoulder; the bag had a hole in it, and holes fell out of it, here one and there one—in this place, and after a while one in that one to the right of the stream, then one to the left of it; and if any one looks around him in the town, which are round in such a strange fashion, he cannot but laugh; for the houses stand in such curious confusion; when a man wishes to go and see his neighbor, he has to make a leap ("hoppaoh") across the brook; and so this town is called Hoppaoh. That was the birth-place of Hannes-Jacob.

Now when he saw his lord's anxiety, it went to his heart—and immediately he thought of a clever stratagem. Down he went into the stable, took the only pig that was left, threw it down, and knelt down on its back, which made it equal as if it were being killed. The men of Mentz picked up their ears and laughed—for now, they thought the end would soon come. But when three days after, he did the same thing—and again three days after that, and so on, they said: "Why, there must be plenty yet in the castle!—listen! they are killing another hog already!"

Things went on thus for a while, and the Reineckers tightened their belts until they looked like "wags"; they had killed the very cats—"for," said they, "we will have to catch mice ourselves, soon enough"—at last there was no help for it, they must really kill their last pig. Count Reineck bade his people eat, once more, until they were satisfied, saying, "we shall have to die before long." But Hannes-Jacob went into the stable, and now followed like a calf, now bowed like a cow—so that those outside said to one another: "The swine are all killed—now they are coming to the cattle!"

Those in the castle knew better, for they were almost starved; at last, one day, when only the last ham was left, and scarcely any one could stand for weakness, except Hannes-Jacob, the Count came among them, and said: "I thank you, dear, faithful comrades, that you have held out so manfully to the last—but now our hour is come.
