Agricultural.

Clearing Land of Rocks and Stumps.

We have often been surprised in traveling through the various parts of the country to see so much valuable ground taken up by rocks and stumps. Do farmers who have their ground encumbered in this way ever calculate how much they are losing each year, not only in the ground so occupied, but in the wear and tear of agricultural implements, used in cultivating the same, besides the great inconvenience in working among them. There are many thousands of farms of the richest soil, and in other respects desirable, having such rocks everywhere within a few rods of each other, which the owners are trying to cultivate according to the rules given by agricultural writers—that is, to buy ploughs, cultivators, harrows, rollers, mowing machines, horse-rakes, tedders, and other labor-saving machines, and try to use them, instead of using the spade, grub hoe, and other hand implements, such as were formerly used in New England, and even now are used by many. I suppose farmers and writers upon agriculture have found it a stubborn necessity that timber should be cleared away before the land could be cultivated at all, but they appear to think the rocks and stumps are no obstacle, or that they are fixtures like the mountains, and immovable. So they say nothing about them, but let them remain; to plow, and hoe, and cultivate, and mow, and rake about as best they can. Now, I am opposed to this way of doing things. When I first bought the farm I now occupy, I asked the advice of several farmers as to the best way of getting rid of the rocks, and they all advised sinking as the cheapest and best way to dispose of them. But I soon found it would not pay, because to sink rocks takes from five hours to two or three days' work each, an operation so expensive that not one rock in one hundred thousand ever has or ever will be removed by that or any other process. Farmers finding it does not pay, leave them alone, and not knowing any better way, do nothing with them, and I suppose that to be the reason why the farmers let them remain to disfigure their land. With the above machines no man need be afraid to attack any reasonable sized rock or stump. I find that stumps make a very durable fence, but certainly not a handsome one. I believe that last season I took more rocks out of the ground and put into wall than was ever put into wall in this State.

Now I suggest (and what I say I know to be true, because I have dug rocks for the last two seasons) that there are machines in this part of the country with which two men can take out of the ground and put into a wall one hundred rocks in one day, weighing from two to ten tons each, and that there is a man in this town who has averaged his forty rocks a day for two seasons, and that the wall so made is worth more than the cost of clearing the land; and I know there are hundreds of farms which, on account of the rocks, are being overgrown with trees or turned into sheep pastures, which I could with a machine clear of the rocks for less expense than the timber was originally taken off, and that there is no way for farmers to make money faster than to put their rocks into fence.

Fencing material is at the present time (in most of the older settled States) getting to be a question of importance, to almost all the farmers. Good fencing timber is getting scarcer every year, either iron wire, hedge or stone. Where rocks are abundant, they are certainly the cheapest and best, for once well laid, they will last a life time.—American Stock Journal.

EXPERIMENTS have shown that a mellow, loamy soil is capable of absorbing in twelve hours, when exposed to a moist atmosphere, an amount of water equal to two per cent. of its weight. This properly possessed by a mellow soil is one that in a dry season is able to give it the power of maturing a crop, when a hardened surface would be unable to do so. A surface that is impenetrable to the atmosphere of course could not absorb any of the moisture with which the atmosphere is charged. But when rendered free from lumps by repeated harrowings, each change of temperature causes a circulation of air through the mass of soil, which is free then to absorb all the moisture coming in contact with it, until saturated.—New England Farmer.

WORTH OF THE ORCHARD.—It certainly pays to take a little pains with young trees, for what is there that is more remunerative than an apple crop one year after another? Who among our readers would be willing to take $5 per tree for an orchard of young apple trees just coming into bearing? We have now an orchard of 600 apple trees, covering a lot of 15 acres, that we would not have taken from our grounds for $3000. Add 5 years more to them and one will see what they add to the land. It is the strangest thing to us to see farmers own 100 to 200 acres of land, with barely enough apples to supply the family; or perhaps, an old orchard of 100 or 150 trees, occupying three to four acres of land, from which they realize more profit than from any twenty acre field they have, not planting more apples, or, after they do plant them, not giving them the proper care. When will farmers see this in its true light?—Small Fruit Recorder.

At a meeting of the Bee-Keepers, at Cleveland, O., lately, Alsike clover was warmly advocated by some of the experienced persons present as a superior honey plant and for pasturage. It is sown in the spring by itself, 3½ lbs. of seed being enough for an acre. It blooms the first season, say by the 10th of June, and the honey was claimed to be better than from any other plant. One other member said that he would set out this spring 4,000 linden trees for his bees, believing the honey afforded by them unsurpassed. Another reported 53 lbs. of linden honey brought by one swarm during the day. He has, after such a result, unbounded faith in the linden as a pasture for his bees at least.

ASHES.—Spread ashes early in spring on grass or wheat; for corn or potatoes throw a handful in the hill at planting. Coal-ashes are worth but little on light soil, and but little more on heavy soil, except to loosen the texture.

Young Folks.

The Fairy of the Lake.

The miller Rudolph and his wife Martha lived very happily together. They had a good mill, a good house, fat kine and golden crops; and daily he waxed richer and sleeker. So it went on for many years, until all the country side rang with the fame of the wealthy miller Rudolph.

"But never call a man happy until he is dead," says the proverb. If joy comes in the daytime adversity often comes in the night, and, as fast as the miller's wealth had accumulated, it melted away still faster-like snowcastles I have seen children rear, to be melted by the heat of the noonday sun. His crops failed, his kine took sick and died, debt laid its heavy fetters on him, and at last nothing remained to him but his mill. Nevertheless he toiled away with as stout a heart as he could maintain.

One morning he arose as soon as the lark's song was heard in the air. The sunrise was just lighting up the woods and fields, and the earth looked so beautiful that Rudolph went forth to soothe his aching heart by gazing on it. As he mused by the flowery banks of the lake he suddenly heard a soft melody, and looking round he saw a lovely woman, or what seemed a lovely woman, hovering over the water. He had never seen aught so bright or beautiful before, and he felt his heart beat with new hopes, for he knew at once that it was the spirit of the lake—the fairy Aquarella—who occasionally revealed herself to the eyes of trusting and simple minded mortals.

Gliding over the lake, Aquarella addressed the miller in her softest voice;

"Why art thou so sad; why are thine eyes heavy, and thy brow wrinkled with care?"

"Ah! gentle spirit of the lake I was once rich and happy, but misfortunes have fallen upon me. I have lost my gold and my oxen, my flocks and my yellow corn. Formerly I was honored by my neighbors, for the successful man ever has friends; now they pass me by with a cold eye and a silent lip; I can no longer serve them, and not one of them now says 'Good day, Herr Rudolph.'"

"Hast thou lost all thy property?"

"Nay, most Serene; I have yet my old mill left to me."

"Hast thou ever wanted food to support, or raiment to clothe thee?"

"I cannot say I have, fair spirit; my coat is of stout Saxony wool, and there is ale in the cellar and cold meat in the larder."

"Hast thou ever lost any one whom thou didst love?"

"No, indeed; I cannot remember the death of my parents; my wife is still hale and hearty, and I have neither kith nor kin to trouble me."

"Then thou hast no cause for grief; thy lot is brighter and happier than that of thousands. "Be of good cheer, work and hope," said the water spirit.

"But I have lost crops, and oxen, and sheep and one thousand crowns: oh! I am the most miserable of men. Most Serene can'st thou not help me?"

Aquarella mused. "Even so, Rudolph,' she at length replied, "I can make thee richer and more prosperous than before; but I warn thee that no good may come of it."

"Richer and more prosperous, and no good come of it! Ah, most Serene, thou art playing with my simplicity."

"Well, then, thou must promise to give me what has just been born in thy house."

Without a moment's hesitation, for his soul was inflamed by the desire of riches, the miller answered: "That I promise to do." What can it be, he thought to himself but a puppy or a kitten.

"Get thee home then, and thy wish shall be fulfilled." and Aquarella retired like a sunbeam to her cool bowers beneath the waves.

The miller on his way home was met by the servant, who cried: "Master, Master, haste thee, speed thee! The mistress hath made thee the father of a fine boy."

The maid could not understand the sudden pallor that spread over his countenance, nor the slowness with which he dragged himself toward the mill. On entering his wife's chamber he showed no signs of rejoicing. Alarmed at his gloomy brow the good woman cried. "Why dost thou not make glad over our bonny new born?"

Then, with a sigh, Rudolph opened his heart to her, narrated his interview with Aquarella, and the promise he had made to the fairy. "What will wealth avail me now, if I must lose my child for it?" cried the unhappy.

"Alack-a-day, indeed Rudolph," said his wife, "it were better if thou hadst been contented with thy lot; but still as the fairy said, let us work and hope.'"

It soon became evident that the fairy intended to fulfill her part of the compact to the uttermost. Prosperity returned to the miller. He succeeded in everything he undertook. His crops were the finest, his oxen the fattest in all the country side. He enlarged his lands by yearly purchases, and each purchase seemed more profitable than the last. His horn of plenty ran over, and he became ten times richer than before. Yet wealth did not bring happiness. A burden was on his heart which he vainly strove to throw off. One fatal remembrance poisoned all his enjoyment, and he never passed along the shore of the lake without a fear that Aquarella might suddenly demand the fulfillment of his promise.

He guarded his child with the most anxious solicitude. "Beware," he said, "if you but touch the water, the fairy will seize your hand and drag you down." The child, however, grew into a boy, and the boy into the man, and the fairy in no way molested him, so that, by degrees, the miller's anxiety was mitigated, and he ceased to be constantly apprehensive.

Fritz, as his son was called, showed himself worthy of a father's love. He was frank, handsome, generous, dutiful and affectionate. In all manly sports he was a great proficient, and such was his skill with the rifle that the lord of the manor appointed him his grand huntsman. Soon after this event he married a fair and loving girl named Oriana, and his father built for them a pretty cottage in a leafy glen, where they all lived together in hapiness and peace.
