Stable Floors.

Much has been written upon the best material and style for the floors of stalls for horses. All agree that nothing is so well suited to promote the comfort of the animal, and to preserve the feet and legs in a healthy condition as a level bed of earth. But for obvious reasons this is regarded as impracticable in our climate. In England, it has heretofore been the custom to pave the floors of stalls usually with cobble stones, giving them a slight inclination either to the rear or the center, where a gutter or grate received the urine. Recently, good authorities have approved of the American plan of chestnut or oak plank instead of stone, and a trial in London is said to have proved that horses stand with more ease and safety on wood. The great objection to our common stable floor is the pick of from one to four inches, which is given for the purpose of draining of the urine. This is often much larger than necessary, but any inclination to the rear is injurious for the reason that the toes of the animals are thereby turned up, and the back sinews, especially of the forelegs, kept in a sort of unnatural tension. Most men would object to being compelled to stand on their heels, and horses in pasture are seen to stand with their fore-feet in lines which they have stamped out of the soil. This condition tends to remove the strain from the back sinews and give them rest. One of the best devices for overcoming this difficulty in stable floors has heretofore been a sort of wooden grating or movable door placed upon the ordinary plank, the rear end of the pieces of grating being two or three inches thick, and the other end, and the pieces being fastened half an inch apart, so as to allow the urine to flow down on the lower floor, and then to the gutter in the rear, as usual. This arrangement is something of an annoyance, and a better one in desirable. The following plan has been devised and adopted for my own stable, and seems to answer every requirement. A floor of planks, with an inclination to the rear of two inches is laid in the ordinary manner, except that the planks extend only to within two feet of the front of the manger. The space between the ends of the planking and manger are covered with pieces which are of the same thickness with the planks where they join them, but are raised as to be an inch and a half higher at the manger. Thus a pitch forward of an inch and a half in two feet is obtained, and the horses can stand as suits him best, either as when tending in the field, or on the line of junction with his fore feet level, or back of it with his toes turned up. The urine flows to the rear as usual, and the extra expense is merely nominal.—Scientific Farmer.

Saving Seed Corn.

J. L. Budford asks us the best method to be pursued in the saving of corn for seed so as to improve the variety, and inquires which of two ears should be selected when they are both on the same stalk. Corn for seed should be gathered and housed before being exposed to severe cold or freezing rains, as when left longer in the field its vitality is greatly weakened. If the crop is gathered early it is an excellent plan to use a small box, either of a wagon or attached to the rear end of a wagon, into which the ears selected for seed may be thrown as they are found; but if the crop is not harvested until late, it is better to go through the field with a basket and select as much as may be needed. In selecting the ears for seed, they should be taken from strong and vigorous stalks, and should be well ripened. Strip down the husks and see that the ears are well filled out and of nearly the same size as possible at both ends. Special care should be taken that the upper ends of the ear should be of good size and filled clear out to the tip. As far as possible select the largest ears; when there are two or more ears on a stalk, take the best one, whether it be the upper, or lower one, and if both are of fair quality, take both. The seed ears having been selected, they should be placed under a shed, or in some sheltered place for a few days until they are dry. All the husks excepting about a half a dozen should be removed and then, by the use of the remaining husks the ears should be made up into bundles as large as can be handled conveniently. The ears should be stored in some dry place where they will be free from the attack of mice and will not be too hot. In the Middle and Southern States the seed may be kept in the granary, but in the Northern States it will be better to keep it in the attic or a store-room of the dwelling house. When kept properly dry, the seed will endure a much greater degree of cold without injury than when kept in an atmosphere which has any appreciable amount of moisture in it. The selection and saving of corn for seed is one of the most important items in the raising of the crop, as from inferior seed, only inferior crops can be hoped for, while with seed carefully selected year after year, the crop will show a continued improvement in both quantity and quality.—Practical Farmer.
