We shou keep our cows like the Dutch do their feed ing steers-quiet and free from exposure. Cows are more abusive to each other and more restless than steers, hence the greater the necessity for confinement in good stables. It may be urged that the Lancaster barns afford no shelter for the manure, but with their small yards the depth of the manure requires all the rains that fall upon i to keep it in good condition. The Dutch manure piles are really nicer to handle and spread, and the quality equally good with that kept under our wide sheds.

The subject of barns elicited a consider a ble amount of experiences from the different farmers as to keeping quantities of hay in stone or wooden structures for barns-most of them contending that the modern structures were the best, that hay or grain needed ventilation in process of curing while in the barn, although instances were cited where the hav cut very green and put into the mow came out in most excellent condition.
