Prog Soup.

Mr. Beck's father was a rich merchant in Boston, who was agent for the French government, and brought into close connection with the French officers attached to the squadron which for a time was anchored in Boston Harbor. His house was the resort of the foreigners, who were looked upon with unbounded curiosity by the Boston people, brought for the first time into acquaintance with a nation uniformly traduced by the British. It was incredible to them that persons who were popularly supposed to submit mainly on frogs should be so plump and well-flavored; but the original facts were stoutly maintained and supported by the rumor that they had been discovered hunting for their favorite food in the frog pond on the Common.

An Audience One.

Governor Joseph C. Foster, the veteran American manager, actor and author, some years ago organized a theatrical company to play short engagements in various cities and towns of the west. They arrived at Baggs, Ohio, a small city on the Sandusky river, where bills were issued, a hall rented, and properties engaged. During their stay a novel incident occurred. Mr. Foster was sitting in the hotel, (the Sim's hotel), running in all probability, upon the full house he was to have, when a stranger entered the room with a bill of play for the evening's performance in hand. "Are you the manager of the theatre?" asked the stranger. "I am, sir," replied Foster. "You are to play 'Richard III.' to-night?" "Yes sir." "I am and have always been fond of theatricals, but never had an opportunity of seeing Richard III." "Very well, sir, come to-night." "Unfortunately, I leave town this evening by the 6:45 train. Now how much money would induce you to play Richard III. for this afternoon?" Foster thinking the stranger was joking, replied that he would do it for twenty-five dollars. The stranger looked at the bill again, and inquired of the circumstance. The idea of playing "Richard" to an audience of one was so excessively ridiculous, and so new in their experience, that they and all consented. Two o'clock came and the solitary audience assembled. Choosing an eligible position, and cocking his feet upon the back of the seat in front of him, he waited for the performance to begin. The bill rang, up went the curtain, and the play commenced. Never did actors do better. They all exerted themselves to give their part an entertainment value. The price paid for it, and they succeeded. The stranger applauded vigorously at different points, and at the close of the play called the Richard, Mr. Joseph T. Fannin, before the curtain, who responded in a neat little speech. A dance and a song followed, after which the farce of the "Rough Diamond" was played. The audience laughed, roared and applauded, and left in time to catch the 6:45 train.
