Injury to Manure Under Cover.

The practice of keeping and storing manurs in cellars and sheds is often recommended, the reasons given for adopting such a better off than they were eighteen years ago, ourse being that it is saved from all loss by exposure to the rain and weather. This selves if they will overcome the extravagant wheat at 60lbs, the 23d square alone would looks well in theory, but in practice I have found that stable manure either from horses fever.

or cattle, with the usual quantity of brdding intermixed, when protected from the rain, will heat and fire-fang so as to injure ts quality seriously. If the pile is large the loss will be comparatively much greater, for it will heat worse. For a few years past I calculated to be of more interest to Amerithe basement under the stables, and of course no rain or snow ever falls upon it. The con-Althrop House and the village of Little dred and seventy five feet in height and seven hun-dred and seventy five feet wide. no rain or snow ever falls upon it. The consequence is it heats and burns so badly that Brington there are mementors of the same prence is it treats and ourns so barry and it Brington there are inclusion. The parish of family no less interesting. The parish of is so light that a pair of oxen can draw a Brington is situated about six miles from cord of it easily. I do not consider such manure very valuable, and do not pay much Northampton, and contarts the villages of LINIMENT IODIDE AMMONIA for it. I generally put it in my hog pen, and Great and Little Brington, Nobottle, and think that is the best way to dispose of it. I will say, however, that I once bought a pile of cow manure under a barn that had been accumulating for a year, which was a compared of the seat of the Spencer family a family that has been a power in the state and has influenced the tide of affairs for many generations. Great Brington (or Brington, as it is called by the natives, from prime article, as the crops grown where it was appled have proved; but it was clear bryn, hill, and ton, town) is a village of some hundred to a hundred and twenty droppings, without litter of any account.

To my own case I have two barns, with lables in each. The manue made in one lables in each. The manue made in one stables in each. The manure made in one lets. The former is about haif a mile from stables in even. The handle into the open lets. the former is accounting as conthere till needed for spring crops. The to adjug of the cattle, and the rain falling upon it, prevent it from heating much, and there is not enough rain to leach out its good qualities. The manure made in the other barn is thrown out into a shed, where it is becorated, it now has the appearance of a heats badly if allowed to accumalate; so, to avoid less, I cart it out frequently. I do not Gray, and Spencer during the fifteenth and believe that stable manure loses any of its valuable qualities because the pile is exposed to the air, but I do not believe that stable manure which is largely composed of litter. when kept under cover, losses much of its value by overheating.

As We Were And As We Are.

A COMPARISON OF WAGES AND THE PRICES form windows. This is the mortuary chapel OF PROVISIONS.

'Tax anything but beer,' was the utteranc of a German statesman, which indirectly enforces a large economic truth. Beer is not an article of pr me household necessity, but Teutonic custom has made it so regarded in Germany. If we vary the statesman's meaning a little, we may say that while few people look at the large truths of natural economy, everybody appreciates the simple facts of household expenses in which the larger truths find expression. We are sure, there-fore that the following comparisons showing how certain necessities of life have fallen in price will be readily understood by people without any dissertation on the causes : Prices of produce and provisions at Chicago on the 1st of October of each year from
