Jesse Arnott, a wealthy and respectable resident of St. Louis, was astounded when in officer arrested him on a charge of stealing a dog. He went to court, and there met the conclaint in the person of Mr. Toma skewitz, the chief clerk of a leading dry goods store. Arnott was sure that he had stolen no dog, but Tomaskewitz made the occusation so explicitly that the Justice did not feel justified in dismissing the case. Then Tomaskewitz quietly added that the prisoner had also stolen the doors and windows out of a church, and the tombstone rom a graveyard. He had, in fact become asane, and the first evidence was a mania for accusing persons of imaginary crimes, Sir Vincent Eyre, a retired Major-General of the Indian army, found the grave and tombstone of Keats, the poet, who died in Rome in 1821, and who was buried in old cemetery for English Protestants wholly neglected. The inscription on the stone 'Here lies one whose name was writ in water," was almost lifegible from dirt and de cay. He made a collection, remained the grave, cleaned the tombstone, and placed a medallian of Keats on the wall near the ! grave, with the following acrostic : Keats, if the cherished name be writin water.
