

Hancock Under Fire. A STORY OF HIS DASH THROUGH THE WILDERNESS HIS DASH THROUGH THE WILDERNESS UNRELATED.

Who'll remember to have seen anything in reference to General Hancock's dash upon the wilderness and on the line of the Potomac, without it being a mere reference to the series of engagements had with the rebels during the first days of the Grant advance on Richmond.

That General Hancock had been offered the command of the entire army of the Potomac was generally credited here and there, but it was not until the arrival of the late General Lee at the front that the fact was generally known.

At the dawn of day, May 12, 1864, sheltered by the dim twilight and a dense mist, the Hancock corps moved quietly and cautiously up from its position on the south side of the Potomac to the north side and toward the enemy's lines.

The troops gallantly surmounted all the difficulties in reaching the base of the hill, the excitement increasing, till it broke out in a splendid rush at the rebel entrenchments which the troops leaped with loud cheers, dashing into the enemy's camp and compelling their surrender en masse.

It was here that Hancock exhibited the true ideal of the general. Finding his men likely to water they considered considerably numbered, he rode up close to the lines and in a loud voice called his men to "stand firm" and as if necessary to encourage them at this critical moment, he drew his sword and led the column forward until they had scaled the pits.

Indignation among the passengers in a railroad car is reported from Ohio because a lady left her pug dog drink out of a tin cup attached to the water cooler.
