Father counted and found two missing, and returning to the first floor found the cradie floating with the two-year-old babe in it, and the little boy clutching to a spinning-wheel with only his head above water. We were all taken from our beds without time to dress, and were obliged to sit on that bare floor exposed to rain and cold for ninetcen hours, with no other covering than our night clothes. Father says that the constant flashing of lightning enabled him to see that the valley was filled with water from hill to hill, and the rain falling in sheets caused a white foam to cover the surface and make it a grand sight to behold. He also saw what, by the direction of Providence, had saved us from being swept away with the flood-a very large tree that stood just above the house, had been turned out by the roots with top toward the house, and in such a position as to divide the current, throwing it on either side of the old building, forming an eddy just large enough to protect the house and us from inevitable destruc After the storm had ceased father's two
