March 31-31

My brother grasped my hand as he said these words, and did not release it until he had drawn up the time-honored steps of our ancestral home and begun to assist me to unfasten my great coat.

"And how are you, my lad?" he continued, without giving me time to reply to his hearty reception.

"Why, you look as brown as a berry, and certainly in the prime of your fifteen year's nabobism."

I had just returned to England after having endured the trying climate of India for fifteen years, and had hastened at once to the old mansion where I had been born, and which was now the property of my father.

Our family here the honored name of Stanley, and are a younger branch of the noble house of that name. They had been settled for many centuries in a wild part of the Northwest of England, Yorkshire, upon an estate that was very beautiful from an artistic point of view, but very poor from a pecuniary aspect, and consequently many generations of younger sons had been forced to push their way into the world as I was.

My father, Stephen, was 12 years older than I was, and had always regarded me with an affection more fatherly than brotherly, delighting in giving me pet names, and even when years of foreign travel had tanned my original fair complexion and silvered my hair, I was called by the name which, upon this our first meeting after many years, he ignored the present, and kept up the old manners and sayings which had characterized him when I was a boy at Stanley House.

A substantial repast was provided for me in the old dining room, and I had just finished my dinner, and was about to retire to my room, when my father called me to him, and said, "I have not noticed it, but it may be, it may be."

"Indeed it is, Stephen," I said; "and I think you are allowing the best part of the house to fall into decay. Now, in my father's day the West wing was a fine thing, and it is a pity that it should be allowed to fall into decay."

"Flash!" he cried, interrupting me with a startled look in his eyes. "Don't mention that, for heaven's sake! She loved those rooms."

In a moment I had grasped his hand, and exclaimed, "Forgive me Stephen!" I exclaimed as the terrible truth flashed across my mind, and I saw I had opened an old wound.

"There is nothing to forgive, Alf, my boy," he said, looking into the bright fire with an anxious, troubled face. "I could not know of all the horror of that terrible time."

Indeed I could not; for I was but a boy when I went to India. Nevertheless I had heard sufficient while there of my brother's unfortunate marriage to convince me of the pain which my allusion to it would give him. I had heard how he had married a beautiful girl, and how fondly he had loved her, and how, after three months of married life, she had deserted him. With whom or whether she had gone no one knew; and her name had become almost a forgotten sound at Stanley House.

I changed the subject of conversation and tried to make him forget the unpleasant recollections which my words had raised, by relating some of the most amusing adventures that had befallen me whilst abroad; but, though I succeeded in diverting his attention, he still tried to shake off the gloom that had settled upon his mind, he never quite regained his wonted cheerfulness during the remainder of the evening, and retired early to rest, excusing himself by saying it was his custom.

Among the fruits of civilization which my somewhat stormy passage through life had taught me that of late hours was by no means the smallest; and knowing it would be useless for me to turn into bed before midnight, I put on my hat, lit another cigar and strode into the grounds to get a breath of fresh air and to get a glimpse of the stars.

It was a fine summer night. The moon was shining brightly from the east, and I knew every foot of the ground, and visited many of my favorite haunts, and it must have been about 11 o'clock before I began to think of returning to my room, when I went out when I reached the bottom of the long avenue of tall trees, and beginning to feel chilly I walked some way quickly towards the house, crunching the gravel beneath my feet as I went.

As I drew near the front door my attention was attracted by the sudden appearance of a man bearing a lantern, who had evidently heard my footsteps, he stopped and awaited my approach. At first I thought he was one of the servants, but upon drawing nearer I was surprised and drew it was my brother. I hastened to speak to him, when, to my great astonishment, after glancing at me eagerly, he turned away without any sign of recognition and hurried rapidly in the direction of the West wing. My first intention was to call out after him, but upon second thought I decided not to do so, for I was per-

LONG AGO.

I felt beside the sleeping fire, Watch the windings, as I gazed; All through the night I sought not fire— But they have faded long ago.

Alas!—that to dust—the last repose— I have to cheer thee, my dear one, How sorely this hath been with those, Those whom I loved so long ago.

How surely this with me will be! From every petty joy and weep, From faded hopes, from faded loves, Made free and set—ah! long ago.

And yet may some things with us stay— As on the water lilies how In white and green—just as they lay In white and green, so long ago.

This pleasant new to think, "Perhaps In memory's light one's face may glow;" "Out upon time!"—for all things pass In that sad, dreary long ago.

But which I read don't think forget— Thou whom I used to treasure so; Yet may one hour thee yield yet, Because I loved thee—long ago!
