the Chamber of Commerce, the New York Historical society, the Union League club, the Astee club, a committee of ex-Confederate veterans United States Christian commission, former diplomatic and consular officers, the Grant Monument association, the Citizens Law and Order league, and the Chamber of Commerce of New Haven, all had delegatas in carriages. Following them, in carriages also, were representatives of the various New York commercial exchanges, many of the varriages being distinguished by banners bearing the titles of the organizations. There was also a division of Republican clubs, under command of Colonel Charles C. Otis. In the carriages were representatives of the county committee, the Young Men's Republican clubs of New York, of Kings county, of Jersey City, and of Baltimore, and of the Lincoln League of the Third Ward Lincoln club.

The Song of Veterans turned out 500 strong. The Knights of Pythias wore a striking uniform and moved with marked precision, as did also the Knights of Sherwood Forest. The Order of United American Mechanics was represented by Excelsion Council No. 14, and Valley Forge Council No. 2. Societa del Fraterno Amors, were followed by the Excelsior Association, of Jersey City, brought the procession to a closs. The last man passed, the Brick church at 3:30 P. M.

The last subdivision was under command of Colonel John W. Jacobus, and although last it by no means attracted the least attention. The Association of Exempt Firemen and the Volunteer Firemen's association had in their ranks a large delegation of the men who in olden days were the pride of all New Yorkers, and they carried themselves like veterans. Their marching was so good that it elicited subdued applaus from those on the sidewalks.

veterans. Their marching was so good that it elicited subdued applauss from those on the sidewalks.

From estimates gathered during the passage of the column the number of persons in line will fall little short of fifty thousand men. This number was made up as follows:—General Hancock and staff and United States army, Navy and Marine corps, 2,560 men; General Shaler's column of National Guard from New York and other States, armed versus and other organizations, 16,000 men; General Sickles' column of veteran associations and operations, 3,500 men; General McMahon's column of civic organizations and delegations, 3,500 men; Colonel Hedges' column of officials and mourners, in carriages, 3,200 men; aids and mounted men, 500.

During the passage of the procession the streets of the city other than those immediately in the vicinity of the moving column were almost deserted. From dense crowds along the line, recruited from the suburbs and from distant towns and cities, it is a fair estimate to say half a million people were spectators of the funeral procession of General Grant.

the pavement, was formed from the east crest of the bluff at the end of the park as far as the eye could reach down the drive. First it was a single line, soon it doubled, then it trebled, until the shoals of new arrivals that came tramping across the meadows in the rear, wending their way through the dusty streets and taking short cuts over fences and across private yards, swelled it to an army. All footsteps tended to the same point—the tomb on the hilliop.

It was marvelous to see the people come. Men and women were burrying on foot, dragging crying children along by the hand as though they had not a minute to lose, eithough the body of the great man whose coffin they were all out on purpose to see had not yet left the City Hall. In cabs, in carts, in busses, in lumbering trucks, in horse cara, or anything that would run on wheels, the multitude kept coming, the number of persons that rode being invariably determined by the capacity of the vehicle and not by the physical endurance of the horses. As the line stretched further and further down the edge of the drive toward Seventy-second street, policemen were stretched out in front of them, a few feet apart. It was a remarkable sight, even for a New Yorker, to see a straight line of blue coats and brass buttons nearly three miles long stemming back as effectually as a stone break water sets a limit to the tide the turbulent, pushing crowd of human beings behind them. We or to the man or woman that tried to cross the sidewalk. At the street corners the thoroughfare was kept open, but no vehicles were allowed to roll into the park drive, nor could the wagons come to a standatill at the street line.

By 10 o'clock, when the first gun from the war ships on the river announced to the crowd that the great pageant was on its march, even people in the rear could not find places to stand between 122d and 127th streets, so they began to broaden out the line down toward the city almost out of sight of the tomb. At any time, however, till the funeral procession for two ho

THE CLOSING CEREMONIES.

Beautifut and Impressive Services at Heantiful and Impressive Services at the Tomb.

Amid bugle calls and the rapid shouting of orders, the rattle of musketry, the roil of drums, the prancing of lorses, immense bodies of troops deploying into line and into columns, long rows of bayonets glistening like streaks of burnished silver, the boom and smoke of cannon rising from the river, a great display of uniformed soldiery was soon massed around the tomb. It was a sight that those who saw it will never forget. The various regiments and bands, moving here and haiting there, formed a kaleidscope of the most brilliant colors. The Seventh regiment skirted the bluff facing the tomb, and the Twenty-second continued in an even line beyond them. The marines tringed the sirve and crept up the hill toward the holel. The artillery men filled up a bend in the plain to the right. The regular infantry got behind the trees on the highest point of land in the park, where there is some talk of putting the permanent tomb. The veterans filled in vacant places as close as they could conveniently get to the tomb, and yet leave room for the distinguished civilians and mourners. General Shaler and his staff, General Hancock's aides, and numerous others on horsebackifdrew up within easy hearing of the vault and added by their soldierly bearing to the magnificent spectacle.

Meanwhile the country were getting out of carriages to bid a great here farewell. Drs. Douglas, Shrady and Sands stood within twenty feet of the bier of him over whom they had watched so many anxious hours. The Rev. Dr. Newman and the little group of clargymen of various ceecis who had been invited to participate by their presence waited, with uncovered heads, close at hand. President Cleveland and the members of his cabinet, ex-Presidents and ex-cabinet officers, distinguished generals, judges and diplomats, governors of States, heads of departments, and mayors of great cities, were all dividing off into groups and drawing closer and closer around the tomb.

Soon after the black horses somewhat dusty fro

When the committal service was over an artilleryman sounded the tatroo on the bugle, according to Colonel Grant's request, and then strong men lifted the coffin again, much the heavier from its cedar coffin, and disappeared with it into the vanit. There was a slight creaking, as of rollers, which soon ceased, and the listoning mourners knew that the old hero's mortal remains had reached the end of their long journey. The men standing near the gate draw back and let the bereaved children stand looking in at the entrance of the tomb for a moment, their heads bowed in grief. Mrs. Sartoris trembled with sobs she strove in vain to suppress, and her brother led her back to the carriage. In another minute they were gone. The generals and government officers looked in at the gate, grasped hands at parting, and were soon scattered on their several ways. The entire service lasted very nearly an hour.

As the mourners and visitors moved away the Fifth artillery men, from Governor's Island, began their long vigil over the dead general's tomb. The Seventh regiment faced the river and fired three parting volleys of massistry. The Twenty-second regiment followed with three volleys more, which, in turn, were succeeded by three salvos from the artillery, and a President's salute of twenty-one guns.

Mrs. Grant, the widow of the General, was not present. Some of her friends strongly urged her up to a late hour on Friday to be present, but she said that she felt that she had bid the General "good-by" at the funeral services at Mount McGregor, and she preferred to have that as the remembrance of their last parting. Though it was known that all during the day her sorrow had been so great that she had been more or less confined to her sick room. Still, in a message from Mount McGregor she expressed her satisfaction that she had been true to her original resolution of remaining on the mountain.

Though, in obedience to those in charge of the details of the procession, the Colonel caused his party to be in their carriages son after ten o'clock, it was one p. m. before they were able to fail into line at the hotel, and it was six o'clock at night before they returned. With the exception of the comparatively short interval when they assembled around the tomb they had been compelled to remain in their carriages all that time. This, necessarily, involved more or less discomit, especially to the halies, "but all this was forgotten." Colonel Grant said, "in the opportunity that was afforded them to witness so wonderful a tribute of respect to the memory of General Grant."

The colonel expressed himself as greatly pleased with the arrangements that had been made for the funeral, and with the great popular demonstration of respect. The family had a large number of callers at their rooms in the evening, and it was very late before they were able to retire.

The three sons of General Grant earns into the upper carridor of the Fifth Avenue hotel during the evening, and reselved an ovation. They were introduced to the governors of the members of the Grant family in public since the general's death.
