MURDERED ON THE OARS. THE MARRIAGE AND THE JOURNEY TO MARSEILLES.

"In December, 1862, I was directed to search for a French criminal who had fled to London..."

THE CRIME DISCOVERED.

The murder was discovered soon after daylight in the morning, and a telegram reached Roque informing him that Alfred Laeotte, whose cards showed that he was in his employ, had been murdered and thrown from the train.

THE HEIR.

This information immediately interested Roque, for, singularly enough, he had in his employ as chief clerk a young man about 26 years of age whose name was Alfred Laeotte.

A DISCOVERY.

Alfred returned to the office and entered Roque's private room. Roque quitted the place in such a hurry that he had not taken his overcoat with him.

A BLOODY PLOT.

Now, at the outset, the idea which was in Roque's mind was that when the couple were married he would disclose to Alfred the fact of his being heir to the dead Calcutta merchant.

A SUBSTITUTE.

Alfred went home and communicated to Eugenie all that had happened. She strongly urged him not to go to Marseilles, and finally he agreed that he would send a friend named Masseran and remain in disguise in Paris.

THE MARRIAGE COURTSHIP.

An English gentleman who visited Roumania last year, was present at the marriage fair that is held every year, at the feast of the apostles Peter and Paul...

THE DEATH GRIP.

Both got into the same compartment, and Bertrand, quietly slipped a gratuity into the hands of the conductor.

THE LITTLE BUSINESS.

"Alfred will start for Marseilles by the train which will reach Chalou at midnight. After that there will be a thirty-mile clear run to Tourmes, and everybody will be asleep."
