"Wait a minute," said the claimagent soothingly. "I guess we can make some arrangement.

She sat down again, and the claim agent stepped out into the hall. When he came back a porter followed him, bringing under one arm a small, yellow trunk, tied about with a rope, and somewhat the worse for wear. It could have been bought anywhere for a dol lar and a half. The claim agent looked at the card and compared the checks. "Is that your trunk ?" he asked.

Her face was red as a beet, as she acknowledged, with very bad grace, that "The trunk hasn't been hurt at all," said the claim agent, "except by the wetting it got when the baggage-car fell into the creek. If you've got the key here, we'll open it, and see what the damage was."

"I-I've-lost the key," she stammered.

"Oh, well, then, we'll break it open." said the claim agent, cheerfully.

"Oh, no, don't do that," she remonstrated. "It-it-ain't my trunk-I borrered it from my sister, an' she wouldn't like that I should break the lock. I'd ruther take less money."

"I guess you would," said the claimagent, with a chuckle. "I ain't been claim-agent on this road for five years without meeting lots of people like you. We'll give you fifteen dollars for what damage the water may have done to your baggage-or I'll open the trunk, and you can bring your lawsuit." "I'll take the fifteen dollars," she replied, quickly, but snappishly. And when she had got the money and sign ed a receipt, she relieved her mind by saying, as she left the office : "I wouldn't a thought a rich comp'ny

In Danger of Tipping Up-

During the war it was the habit for delegations of "prominent citizens" to visit Washington to consult with President Lincoln upon the conduct of the war. Sometime during the darkest days a dozen or more of the leading business men of Wilmington, Delaware called upon the President. They told him that they represented the "solid business men" of Delaware, and that they had come to discuss the situation and the means of ending the struggle. After the chairman of the delegation (who is still in active business in mington) had finished his speech the President asked :

"So you are solid men of Delaware?" "Yes," was the reply.

"All from New Castle county ?" "Yes, all from New Castle." "All from Wilmington, too ?"

"Yes, all from the same city," re plied the gentlemen, in a chorus.

"Well," remarked Mr. Lincoln, as his eyes twinkled, "did it ever occur to you gentlemen that there was danger of your little State tipping up during your absence ?'

The delegation returned home wiser, but so full of appreciation of the joke that their friends were not long in hearing of it.-N. Y. Sun.
