PARTED.

Once more my hand will clasp your hand; Your loved voke I shall hear once more; But we shall never see the land, The pleasant land we knew of yore; Never, on any summer day, Hear the low music of its streams, Or wander down the leafy way That leadeth to the land of dreams

Still, borne upon the scented air, The songs of birds rise clear and sweet, As when I gath and roses there, And heaped their glories at your feet; And still the golden pathway lies At eve across the western sea, And lovers dream beneath those skies,

Which shine no more for you and me. No more, ah, nevermore! and yet They seem so near, those summer days, When hope was like a jewel set To shine adown 7 ime's misty ways. I sometimes dream that morning's light Will bring them back to us once more,

And that 'tis but one long dark night Since we two parted by the shore.

We parted with soft words and low, And "Farewell till to-morrow" said; From sea and sky, and sunset's glow A golden halo round you shed; Then as you went, I heard you sing, Haste thee, sweet morrow!" Parting thus

How could we dream that life would bring Not any morrow there for us?

We parted; and that last farewell Its shadow on our life rath cast; And Time's relent ess barriers fell Between us and our happy past; And now we meet when cares and tears Have dulled the parting a d the pain, But never can the weary years Bring back our golden dreams again.

THE BRIARFIELD TRAGEDY.

BY EUGENIA DUNLAP.

Pretty, rosy little Flossie pouted coquettishly, and drew away her hand from her black browed suitor. "No, William-for the last time, 1 won't. So there!" A sudden pallor overspread the swarthy face, and a dangerous gleam shot from the small black eyes as he rud-ly seized the tender round arm of the unsuspicious girl, and bissed in a voice she had never heard before:

"By the Eternal, you shall! You shall, or I'll murder you!"

With a shrick the terrified girl sprang past him and fled into the cosy aitting room where the other members of the family pursued their homely avocations before a wide, old fashioned wood fire.

"Oh, nuntie!" she exclaimed, "I do believe William is crazy!" All were startled at the sudden and violent interruption, but not even the genuine alarm on the girl's face prevented an annoyed rebuke from the clder lady. "Crazy! What do you mean, Florence?

Get up from my side, and do leave off these tragedy airs!"

With eyes wide open in wonder at such a tone from her usually kind protectress the girl slowly arose, and in tears left the room.

"Mother, you were very harsh," remonstrated Margaret, the eldest daughter of the house.

"I wonder what William could have said to her, " spitefully added Eliza, the younger sister; "it's always William!"

"Tut, tut!" said the father, resuming his paper. "The boy is too rough. He's put her out somehow. Wife, you've no call to be vexed. "

"Perhaps I was harsh," said the old lady, "but you don't know how that word 'crazy' horrifies me. My only brother went crazy and took his own life. We never got over the shock. William sometimes has a look of him, and I am in continual fear. He's always been strange. I'm sorry I hurt the poor child's feelings."

Oh! her feelings are to easily hurt, said Eliza.

gayly decorated wagon and bright cos tumes presented the chief attraction in the long line of march. Fios-ic, attired as Goddess of Liberty, stood at the rear of the wagon supported by Lynn Graves, who was a fit knight for the loving service.

Bands were stationed at intervals along the columns, and from the huge wagon resounded the campaign songs i a chorus of patriotic young voices. The customary banners, transparencies, mottoes, caricatures, and illuminations deighted the throng.

In wild excitement William Bedford forsook the ranks and dashed about at random, startling in his recklessness and obtrusive in his actions. Seeking every opportunity to approach Flossie in her new grandeur, he glared upon her furiously. She heeded him not; happiness made here careless, and her secret was revealed.

Before the hour of midnight had chimed from the distant steeple the merry makers were at their respective homes. Mr. Bedford's family separated after a few moments of animated discussion and comment upon the various haps and mishaps of the celebration.

William's mood had changed. He sat quiet and thoughful, taking no part in the conversation. But as Flossie said good night, flinging back her radiant smile, he abruptly arose and bade her stay a moment.

In wondering fear the girl halted, then came back reluctantly to where he stood.

"I have found you out," he said in a slow, passionless sort of way, "I know now why you have no love for me." "Oh, William, don't talk so-don't look so! I have never harmed you-why will you torment me? I don't know what you mean." "Yes, you do," he replied in the same measured tones, "and what I want to say is this: The man you love shall die, I have sworn it. I said I would kill you, but-what? Crying? Poor little Flossie!" In a strangely tender way he laid his hand upon the bowed head of the sobbing girl, whose nerves could no longer bear the tension of excitement. "Why, I wouldn't harm you," he continued; "you couldn't help it. Don't I know he has bewitched you? Yes," he added fiercely, "and I hate him! At sunrise he dies! We shall be happy yet, Go to bed now, my Goddess of Liberty. To-morrow he dies!"

The girl was benumbed with fear. If this were not sheer madness, then what was it? What should she do? Gently she hade the man good night and noiselessly crept up to her uncle's room, which adjoined hers. No one had as yet fallen asleep. Flossie expressed her apprehensions in a cautious voice.

The mother, ever watchful, instantly arose and went to her son's room. She Leard him striling about, but her efforts to enter were rudely repulsed. Anxious and unsati-fied she returned to bed, but in an hour all was quiet and she, too, overcome by the unusual fatigue of the day, fell into a deep sleep. But to Florence sleep was impossible. Only a mile away was the Graves farm. Should she venture to go in the dead hour of night and warn her lover? He had a sister with whom she had frequently passed the night, and as for the future, no one save the two families need ever know that she went alone and for such a purpose. Ere the morning her cousin's strange mood would doubtless have pa-sed away. Softly coaxing the big house dog, the girl sped out into the starlit night, Love made her brave, and to this love she owed her life. Her mission was speedily accomplished. Her lover took e precaution to change his sl apartment in compliance with her whim, and the new sun found her fast asleep beside her school fellow, Marian Graves. Long ere merciful friends would arouse her, the neighborhood was ringing with news of a tragedy such as was never before recorded in the annals of the "dark and bloody ground. " In the dark hours of night William Bedford had killed father, mother, sister, and then shot himself. Of the whole family not one was left. The Bedford homestead is deserted. and the neighbors say it is haunted Flossie never knew the ghastly details of the tragedy which left her sole heir to the property. Lynn Graves married her almost immediately, she was so desolate and unprotected, and took herand the dog to Kansas City, where amid new scenes she tried to forget the past.

"I shouldn't wonder if Lynn Graves could comfort her," said Margaret, meaningly, and the deep flash of annoyance on Eliza's face indicated the cause of her evident spleen toward her father's orphan niece. "So ho!" said the old gentleman, again diverted from the daily news. "The wind's in that quarter, is it? I thought William was sweet on her." "Nonsense, Daniel!" said Mrs. Be-ford.

"Well now, wife, I don't know about that, and I, for one, shouldn't care if he was. The lass is comely and well mannered, and besides, she will have a right snug little fortune of her own. Our boy couldn't be doing better. "

Well, well, we've no call to meddie, Daniel," cautiously replied the old lady; "and the Lord is sure to take care of his own, she piously added, as she picked up a dropped stitch in her knitting. Before retiring for the night kind hearted Aunt Bedford sought her distressed charge, and in words which the affectionate girl never forgot told her of the grim skeleton so long hidden in the closet of the peaceful farmhouse.

"Don't cross him, dear, if you can help it," she said as she left her; "I don't want him to annoy you, but be as patient as you can. "

The summer passed, and William Bedford had ceased to persecute his cousin save by a jealous watchfulness which gave her constant dread. The warm days had been spent by the young people of the adjacent village and vicinity in pleasure parties to the woods and numerous excursions to the blackberry thicket which gave the name of Briarfield to Uncle Bedford's neighborhood.

Flossie Denton was ever the leading spirit, ever the center of attraction. Her childlike nature, whether in dimples or frowns, in sunshine or shower, asserted itself, and many a gallant heart fell victim to her charms.

Lynn Graves did not care to conceal his allegiance, but Flossie could not tell him of her cousin's stormy wooing and terrible threats. The only shadow her young life had known since the hour which made her an orphan was the ever darkening presence of this morose and unhappy man. To the world he was a moody, ill conditioned fellow, and her innocent spirit could not fathom him.

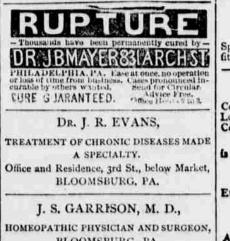

Thus were matters shaped on the night of a grand political harangue and torchlight procession. In the enthusiasm of triumph a glee club had been formed 1 y 40 young vocalists, and their Indian Legend of the Moon.

Here is a peculiar legend of the Indians, as told by the Rev. Mr. Cook, the full blooded Sioux, who is the ministerial representative of the Episcopalian denomination at Pine Ridge Agency, says the Onaha Bee. The legend, which was related to the Indian children at the agency, was of their forefathers' belief as to the cause of the disappearance of the moon. He said the belief was that every time a new moon appeared it was a signal for all the mice in the country to gather themselves together in one spot. When they assembled they separated in four great armies. One army went to the north, another to the south, a third to the east, and a fourth to the west. These armies of mice traveled until they reached the point where, from the place of starting, the heavens seemed to touch the earth. Then they climbed up the sky until they came to the moon, which by this time was what we call full. All of the four armies then commenced nibbling at Luna, and when they had eaten her all up the mice would scamper back down the heavens to the earth and wait for her to show herself again, when the journey and nibbling would be repeated by the mice. And this is what the Indians of early days believed was the cause of the moon growing old and finally disappearing.

Electrical Treatment of Wine. The method of treating wine by electric ty, devised recently in France, destroys the fermentation. It is thought that light wines that can not be exported, owing to being ruined by fermentation, can by this process be sent abroad without danger.
