THREE TRAINMEN KILLED.

Freight engine No. 393, on the Catawissa branch of the Philadelphia

A large piece of timber held him unbefore he was found. Brakeman before morning.

The train was bowling along at a pretty good rate, and suddenly the for any case of Deafness (caused engine mounted the rails, dashed along a few yards, and toppled over the wall carrying with it the freight cars into the creek. It happened so quickly that the men got no warning, and were thus prevented from jumping for their lives. They were carried down with the engine and killed before they realized what had occured

News of the mishap was immedistely sent to Catawissa, and a party of men dispatched to the scene to ender assistance. The wrecking rews were also sent for and soon urrived, and were soon at work clearog away the debris in order that raffic could be resumed.

The only theory advanced for the reck is that the freight engine struck a brake bar that was on the track and caused the switch to open, throwing me train over the wall.
