BONNER'S QUEER ADVERTISING.

whole Pages of the Herald and Tribune Used to Exploit the Lodger, The conversation drifted to advertining matters, and I asked Mr. Bonner to tell me the secret of his success in adrertising, writes Frank G. Carpenter in the Chicago Times-Herald.

"I can hardly remember," said the founder of the New York Ledger; when I was not studying the advantages of different advertising features. when I was a boy the New York Herald was very much criticised by the other newspapers of the country. I saw that the more the Herald was talked about the more the people bought it, and when I took the Ledger I saw that I must get the paper talked about. I must not only have a good paper, but the people must know it. would not borrow, but I spent all my surplus in advertising. One time I spent $2,000 for a single advertisement in the New York Herald; at another I offered the Tribune $3,000 for one insertion in the daily, weekly and triweekly. I paid during one week $27,-900 for advertising, and in one year 150,000. These sums in those days were as big as ten times the same amounts now, and many of my friends publishing installments of a certain but ... story which ended with the words, continued next week in the New York Ledger.' I did this once in the Herald, publishing two instalments, so that the readers thought they were going to then at the close of the second installment stated that they must look for its continuation in the Ledger. All of this rapidly increased my circulation. "One of the secrets of good advertising is to have your advertisements unlike those of any other man. If all advertisements in a paper are displayed, this is equal to no display. My advertisements were always original, they attracted attention, and the publishers of the papers who were averse to a display objected to them. Once "he elder Bennett sent word that I must fewer capitals. I answered that I would not use any, and sepented one _entence announcing a new story over and over again to the extent if several columns without a The letters were continued break. out to the edge of the column line without regard to the finishing of the words, and the next day I had several columns of solid type in the Herald. The advertisement was about the most striking the Herald had ever had, and after that Mr. Bennett told me that I could do as I pleased. At one time the Tribune refused to give me a page in the weekly. Mr. Bennett heard of this and sent word that the Herald would always give me all the space I wanted. I replied that I would take the whole paper on the next Saturday. Mr. Bennett said all right, and he publahed an additional sheet, giving me a page opposite each page of reading matter. I could give you fifty other instances of advertisements which attracted attention, but this is enough. One of the great secrets of success, I believe, is to first have a good thing and then to advertise it so that the sople cannot help knowing that you
