UNAPPRECIATED KISSES.

He never sunk a collier To bottle up a fleet, But the pretty maidens kiss him And exclaim: "Oh, ain't he sweet!"

He never scoffed at danger, Nor made a poet sing; He has never done a single Extraordinary thing.

Still the women, when they see him, Utter words of wild delight, And at once begin to kiss him, Each of them with all her might.

But it hasn't swelled his head up, Hasn't spoiled the little chap-He is three weeks old and doesn't Care a continental rap.

THE CRAMPTON MYSTERY.

"Please tell Mr. Crampton , that I must see him-I have something of the utmost importance to tell him." "Very well, sir."

The maid left Fred Palmer, a hustling youth, with an habitually sensational air, standing by the nat rack, and ran upstairs as fast as she could. The parlor seemed deserted, for there was no fire in it, though it was midwinter. Altogether, the house had a disagreeable feeling of sadness about H. No wonder, considering that the only son of the family had been missing for over a week, and nothing but a crumpled and battered hat found in a passenger coach on the railroad to give a bint of his fate.

Presently the maid came running down the stairs with. "Please come up to Mr. Crampton's room, sir." Which message she delivered breathlessly before she could touch the last step of the flight.

The young man found a picture of bereavement in Mr. Crampton's room. A week before that Leonard Crampton would have been set down by any chance acquaintance as a robust, prosperous man of forty-five. This evening he looked, wrapped in a drab fiannel dressing gown, and seated in an armchair close to the tire, like a man of seventy.

"You have something to say to me, Mr. Palmer?" he asked, in a shaky Toice.

"Yes, sir, and it would not wait, or I would not have troubled you at this hour. To come to the point, I have traced the-murderer."

Mr. Crampton pulled himself forward by the two arms of his chair and stared with open mouth.

"Then poor Bob-my boy has been murdered?'

"Oh, I beg your pardon, sir," said Palmer, starting back and heaitating-"I-1 thought-why, everybody says-I thought you were all reconciled toto this view."

"Yes-yes; go on and tell me. I suppose it must be so. Sit down."

"The man has left Chicago, sfr. The police think he has made his way to Dregon or Washington. They are looking for him on other charges."

"Yes, but I care nothing about other charges. Tell me about this-about my boy."

"Yes, sir," said Palmer; "I am coming to that. This man-commonly known as Nipper Cary-was seen here last Wed

"Then," said Mr. Crampton, "I'L have that well opened, if I have to pay ten thousand doilars for it." Here was where Palmer found his difficulty in the task he had set himself. The Carpenters-two brothers and his wife or one of them-refused to allow the well to be touched. When Mr. Crampton, accompanied by Palmer, visited the Carpenters' place on the morning after this interview, the Carpenters pointed out that the short, thick undergrowth of brushwood at the mouth of the hole was not disturbed, as it would be if a dead body had been dragged thither and thrown in only a week before. Mr. Crampton Carpet Works. pointed to the disturbed fence rails and trampled grass at the break in the Carpet Works. General Fire Extinguisher Co. vs. Magee that some one had passed in that way, walked to the old well and gone back again the same way. But the Carpenters, though they admitted all these evidences, denied the force of Palmer's theory that a murder had been committed thereabouts on the Barre Coal Co. Thursday night of the previous week. It must be said that the Carpen- Barre Coal Co. ters were in a minority. Fred Palmer, in whose ability to ferret out a mystery most of his fellow-townsmen had great confidence, had discovered fresh evidence in the shape of a rag with Barre Coal Co. blood on it in the ditch. Apart from all this strong circumstantial evidence, Barre Coal Co Fred Palmer was the assistant editor of a local morning paper, and at least once before had successfully traced the guilt in another lesser crime to the guilty party.

In the previous case, a small gambling swindle, the opposition paper and most of the inhabitants had ridiculed Palmer's pretensions to being able to solve the problem; this time, at least, the citizens were very wary of premature ridicule.

The upshot of all this was that, while Mr. Crampton consulted lawyers to find a means of compelling the Carpenters to allow their oil well to be excavated, local public opinion in the space of forty eight hours pretty generally came round to Paimer's views; that young Bob Crampton had been murdered for his watch and the considerable sum of money he was known to have had in his pocket; that the murderer was a tramp who had disappeared from the neighborhood on the night of Hob's disappearance, and that Bob's body had been thrown into the abandoned well.

"If you will only bring that villain to justice," Mr. Crampton said to Fred Palmer at a second interview, "you may command any service 1 am able to do you from now on.

That was just what Palmer wanted to hear from Bob's father, chiefly because Bob's father was also the father of Clara. There was more than mere reportorial ambition in this activity of Fred Palmer.

Palmer knew that Nipper Cary was supposed by the Chicago police to have made his way to Oregon or Washington state. He did not hesitate to follow the desperate villain whose description answered so completely to that of the tramp with whom Bob Crampton had been seen.

He had $500 of his own within easy reach. He resolved to send that sum in his struggle for justice and Clara. So he went and spoke about the matter to his editor and chief.

ing about the town. He had on an old brown traveling cap and a dilapidated summer suit. Said he was looking for work. The police here had no idea as to his identity. Thursday be was seen speaking to poor Bob-'

"Good God!" "Yes, sir. Then he followed Boh down toward the freight yards. You remember that was the night-

'Yes. Never mind that-

"Well, sir, it seems that the wife of the gatekeeper at the Love Lane crossing heard some one call for help-a man's voice. She went out and spoke to her husband about it, and he teld her she must be dreaming, that it was a drunken man trying to sing up the lane. Seen after that this same gatekeeper admits that a man answering the description of Cary, only with a derby hat, came to the crossing, carrying a bundle under his arm."

And which way did he go?"

"Well, the gatekeeper says he turned and walked up the line away from town. It was just after that that the No. 9 train went out, you know, sir. And it was on the No. 9 that the porter found Bob's hat-a derby-under the seat. The conductor said, you remember, that a rough-looking man boarded the train at Whitster's and paid his fare as far as Evanston."

The unhappy father was sobbing, and Palmer respectfully paused a moment in his story.

'What do you think this scoundrel did with my son? Where is the body ?" "I have been looking through Love

Lane this afternoon. ...r. Crampton, do you know the cedar clump at the edge of the Carpenter place, just about fifty yards from the crossing?" "Well?"

"I found the bushes a good deal trodden at one place there. The long grass in the ditch at the roadside is dry now, of course, but at this place it was broken and stamped. And two rails of the snake fence have been let down there. Mrs. Carpenter told me that she had never known any one to make a short cet through the cedar clump at that place. But I went and looked about mong the trees and found a well there. It has not been used for years, and the story goes that it is a used-up oil well.'

"And you think ?"

"Yes, sir. 1 think that the murderer threw poor Bob's body down that well.

"But isn't it filled up." "Not up to the top, sir." "Isn't there any machinery in it?" "No, sir. The machinery was all removed long ago."

Seattle to hunt this desperado?" the editor-in-chief asked, incredulously.

"Just that," said Palmer. "See here; suppose 1 end by finding the fellow, the paper gets fame, doesn't it? Suppose I don't find him, what does the paper lose? You can get Giles to supply for me."

"Go ahead," said the chief.

And ahead Palmer went. But he did not leave town without one brief interview with Clara, in which he got that young lady-she was very young, besides being heart-broken about her brother-to promise that if he brought her brother's murderer to justice she would honestly try to love him. The promise was not given very willingly, but it was sincere, and it meant an indefinite deal to Palmer, who was very sanguine.

So Palmer, leaving Mr. Crampton to fight with the pig-headed Carpenter family, set out for Oregon by way of Chicago.

Two days later a letter with typewritten address came to Clara Crampton. Don't be shocked. I have just met that ass, Paimer, coming out of a police station. He rushed up and grabbed me by the shoulder. His jaw dropped when he first saw me. He says you all think I am dead. I am not.

"The fact is, a tramp I came across last week followed me all the way out of Love Lane, trying to buildoze me into giving him something. You know, I meant to go out there and make a moonlight study. It ended in my giving him a bloody nose. Then I went on my way, carrying my sketching box and book under my arm. The tramp tumbled so dead-like into the ditch that after I had left him I gave up the idea of making my moonlight sketch and came back to see if he was hurt badly. "I found that he had crawled on to the Carpenter farm. Then he and I made friends, and I took an idiotic notion to go tramping with him. I had read so much about that sort of thing in magazines. Some days ago I caught on to it that my tramp was not a regular tramp at all, but a big criminal the police here are looking for. Then he suspected me and gave me the slip.

"Since then I have been having a great time looking for him in the slums of Chicago-the police and I.

"I shall be home to-morrow. I am an ass, I know, to frighten you like this. But Palmer is a still bigger ass He says le will go to the Pacific and begin life afresh. I told him it was the best thing he could do. Your sws brother, R. C."-St. Louis Globe-Democrat.
