PARIS LETTER.

From Our Regular Correspondent. PARIS, FRANCE, July 2, 1900.

I shall continue to call it the Paris Exposition and not as it calls itself L'Exposition Universel et Interna-"taken in", squeezed and absorbed, but considering the bloated bigness of France in this great advertising scheme and the comparative pestinesss of all others there is no reason why we needed money, Paris needed money, and they said: Lo! let us invite all the peoples of the earth to board with and buy from us for a season. And they built great structures and towers and wheels and assembled their merchandize and made a great fair and established within it, and around it, booths for dancing girls, and dives and joints and takes, and blagues and loud was the roar and great was the villany and humbug thereof. Unless these abominable fakes and side snows can be abated, and unless an Exposition of what is genuine and meritorious can be condensed and put in reasonable space, they ought to be discontinued. Here in mid summer it is yet impossible to see what is worth seeing, either because it is not ready or because you have to walk around acres of the baldest of fakes and humbugs, ravenous to "take you in" or sell you something. Lime and dust fill the air and make sight seeing uncomfortable if not unsanitary. There are many guide books and they are no doubt in a way phelpful, but in buildings covering many acres and filled with miles of show cases and machinery of great height, a compass is of convenience and many have they.

I find the United States exhibitors situated here and there, apparently without system in the main Champ de Mars building. Their location is always indicated by the stars and stripes, and these are seen over the U. S. pavilion; in many places in in Champ de Mars; in a number of annexes; and at Vincennes, which place is about two hours out of Paris, a most inaccessable locality, but here most of the United States machinery is to be found. It was way out on this frontier that I found an American pioneer. He told me that his exhibit.
