Their Sleeping Apartments Contain Few Inducements to a Morning Nap.

The Chinese are noted as early risers. fact that may be accounted for by the statement that their sleeping spartments are, as described by a reeent visitor to Shanghai, "models of discomfort." These rooms, even in the homes of the wealthy, are usually dark and poorly ventilated, and are like inside cupboards. The bed is usually a canopied, elaborate affair, heavy and beautifully carved, and this piece of furniture is often handed down from father to son through many generations. But there is nothing elaborate shout the bed covering. In place of a mattress there is a mat, and the covering is the occupant's clothing, or possibly a wadded quilt. Extra clothing is provided for cold weather, and in the porth, where the weather is extremely cold, the carved wood bedstead is not used. There, in the house of every sell to do citizen, and in the inns, there are divans of masonry beneath which there are fireplaces, and on these divans the people sleep, and the fire is utilized tor cooking purposes.

There are no pillows in Chinese beds. They have instead hollow square frames of rattan or bamboo, or blocks of wood fashioned so that they fit the mape of the neck and support the head when lying on the side. People who have used these substitutes for pillows my they are much more comfortable than soft, hot feather pillows, especially in hot weather. These substitutes for pillows are used even by those people who have rooms furnished with odern tables and other European furniture.

The Chinese have no use for bath rooms or bathing paraphernalis.
