THAT CRYING BABY. LIFE OF A CHINESE MAIDEN.

N THE spring of 1867," said an old Misfund of reminiscences, relating to Missouri's early days, "I had occasion to go to Kan-sas from Palmyra, and accordingly took the H. & St. Jo train at Palmyra junction. The road then was in a miserable condition, for a had not yet been improved much since Anderson's band and other guerrillahad torn up nearly all the ties on the road. Why, when the war was over there was set much left of it except the rails and rolling stock. "Well, when I got in I went into the deeping car right away, for it was already dark and I was very tired anyway. There was but one berth unoccupied and I availed myself of it. The porter said to me before leaving: 'I hev to tell you, boss, not to spore to-night."

"Why,' I asked, in surprise. 'Haven't I paid for the privilege of sleeping in this car? Yes, boss, the porter said, but Col Elijah Gates, the richest man in Marion county and one of the directors of the road s aboard, and the company don't want any thing done to disturb him for fear he'll sell his stock. You know the 'gorillas' tore up nearly everything during the war, and it hasn't been fixed up much yet.'

"It was about eight o'clock when the colonel said that he was going to bed. He pulled off his boots and coat, took a huge chew of tobacco, bade us all good-night and got into his berth. It was not long before those in the car heard him snoring and we

"About 50 miles up the road from Palmyra woman with a baby came into the coach. There was no berth for her, so the porter told her that she might sit up near the stove in the end of the car, for the baby appeared sickly and the woman's face indi cated that she had been crying. Hardly had the train left the town where she got on when the baby began to fret and cry. porter went a sailing back and excitedly told woman that she would have to make the baby hush for Col. Elijah Gates was aboard and his slumbers must not be dis The woman, mother-like, caught up the child and did a dozen little things to quiet it, but to no avail and the colonel awake with a snort. The first thing I saw was the colonel's bine socks poking through the curtain, then his long legs and body came in sight. Poking his head out of the curtains, he looked at the woman scrutinizingly, but not angrily. Walking down to where the woman was seated, he said:

"My dear madam, you must do something to keep that child quiet. These here people have all paid for their bunks and are entitled to a first-class night's rest. Having raised II children I know that they will ery but as director of the Hannibal & St. Jo I've got to protect the rights of these So you will please keep the baby as quiet as you can.

"The colonel didn't talk at all cross, but the young woman was very nervous and after the colonel went back to his berth she sniffed and tears dripped down on her cheeks and the baby kept crying harder

"There wasn't much sleeping done that night in the car, for the baby kept crying; the woman sobbed and said 'O, dear,' and and the porter was excited to Sleep was entirely out of the question. People poked their heads out as angrily as ever. The colonel stood it for awhile, m again climbed out of his berth and

'Now, my dear woman, as I said afore, I haven't any complaint to make myself, for I'm accustomed to such things, having raised a family of 'leven children, and I know all about them. But these other folks, as I said before, have paid for a night's sleep and it's my plain duty as director of this road to see that they get what they pay for. Seems to me like that there is some way to keep that baby quiet. There's no use for a child carryin' on so. Somethin' look and see if there's not a pin stickin' Having raised a family of 'leven children, I know that pin's often stick children and make them ery that way."

"The colonel went back to his berth apparently satisfied. But the woman could find no pin about the baby's wardrobe, and the baby cried worse than ever. I never heard a child scream and take on so. The woman cried softly, too,

"We all knew, or at least thought, that the colonel would lose his patience after awhile, and when he got out of his berth ence more all of us expected trouble. It was getting on toward morning by this time, and we expected the colonel to storm

"'Look here, my woman,' he said, 'as I was saying awhile ago, you must do somethin' to keep that child quiet. The people here have paid for a night's lodging and they must get some sleep at least. As director of this road I've got to protest. I've raised a family of 'leven children and it don't matter so much to me; but I know as well as I know anything that child is hungry or somethin'. No child every cries that way except when it is downright hungry. Therefore, I insist on your nursing it and giving us peace and quiet.'

"Then the young woman turned red in the face and began to cry. 'Law me, sir,' said she, 'I ain't the baby's mother. 'I'm just

"Where is that baby's mother?' said the colonel, somewhat sharply. 'Why ain't she here attending to her business and takin' care of the hungry and crying baby as she ought to be?" She's in the front car, sir-in a boxdead, the woman said, sobbingly, and we're taking the body and baby back home.

"The colonel started back in surprise, then his eyes moistened, and he tenderly extended his arms, and with his long, bony fingers opened wide, said:

'Young woman, give me that baby.' The colonel took the child in his arms, rocked it and talked to it as tenderly as would the mother were she alive. And the baby seemed to know that in the old man she had found a friend. The old man's smiling face and moothing voice had the right effect; for it was not long before the baby was sleeping soundly, with a smile on its face, in the old s arms. The baby did not cry again that night.

But no matter if it had and we passengers had heard it; for there was not a man in the tar but would have gladly gotten up to help

"Thirty years have passed! It seems so lang ago. But I distinctly remember that last words I ever heard the colonel say: 'It don't matter if that baby does cry,' he said, don't matter if that baby does cry,' he said, it don't make much noise, nohow. And I guess if there's anybody don't like the way of this road he can get off; for being a director of the road, I can see that it is done.

"Col. Elijah Gates has been sleeping for many years in the old burying ground. And the baby is no doubt, now nearly a middle-aged man, and I often wonder if, after he grey no. grew up whether anyone ever told him of the time the colonel held him in his arms and did not conclude to sell his interest in the Hannibal & St. Jo."—Kansas City Times.

There Is No Intermediate Period Between Girlhood and Maturity.

There is in China nothing of the sweet girlhood enjoyed in this country in fact, one rarely sees girls in China. They marry so young that they appear to spring from childhood to maturity without any intermediate stage of girlhood. There is no "blushing 15" "sweet 16," no flirtations, no balls, no picnics, no billet doux. The child has not ceased to play with her doll before she has a baby to dandle.

The only joy of a woman's life is in dressing her hair. This is done with an elaborate artistic science curious to see. Their hair is invariably black and very long. It is drawn tightly from the face and stiffened with gum. It is then piled up in coils and wings and loops that stand slone without the aid of pads, roulets, pugs or hairpins.

There are no spinsters in China, except the nuns who dedicate their virginity to Buddha. These ladies shave their heads like priests and thus deprive themselves of the only Chinese sign of gender-the hair dressed a la
