BY ARTHUR WESTON.

THE wavering gleam of a couple of limelights flickered over a shaky scaffolding which supported the guillotine. A weary orchestra jingled through the opening bara of the Marseillaise.

It was the last scene of a successful play, on the dingy stage of a theater in England, Donald Carter stood on the steps of the guillotine. His face was upturned; his whole figure quivered with nervous force, and his expression was almost divine.

Round the steps of the guillotine was a howling mob of the citizens of Paris, represented by half a dozen "supers" and a thin, undeveloped, trembling girl, who was dressed as a boy in an old blue blouse and brown breeches, with a scarlet cap of Lib erty on her dark hair.

Resting one hand on the rail of the steps, she looked up at Donald Carter, her gray eyes brimming over with tears.

Julie Stern was only 14. The glamour of the stage was written-cruelly, suggestive-ly-on the face of the man and in the eyes

"Oh. Mr. Carter! You are wonderful!" "Who is that? What did you say? Oh, a little Julie Stern, is it? Crying?" He put his hand gently on her shoulder and marched her down the stage, toward the one feeble gas jet on the prompt side. Julie met his searching glance without waver

'You play Phillippe, don't you?" asked Donald: then, before she could reply: "Bad! bad! You can't be thinking of what you

I have only three lines!" exclaimed

"Three lines!" repeated Donald. "Better actors than you or I will ever be have played smaller parts. What do you expect to do at 14? Goneril or Lady Macbeth?" "Julie's eyes flashed.

"There's Philippe!" exclaimed Donald.
"Come! No more tears! Now let me try to make you understand your three lines."

The scene was changed. It was a gayly decorated little room, and the air was heavy with the scent of flowers. It was Julie Stern's own little room at the theater, adjoining the one where she Julie was sitting in a big chair playing with the jeweled chain around her neck and listening to the talk of three men.

Time and success had changed the emo-tional little Phillippe into a lovely wom-an. She was playing Juliet at last, but Donald Carter, as he leaned against the wall by the window, looked at her with his critical glance.

"Beautiful! charmin', my dear girl, simply charmin'!" said one of the men, an actor, who knew her well.

For five minutes her Juliet was the only theme, then the next set was called. "Mercutio" hurried away, the other actor took a lengthy good-by, and she was left alone with her eldest friend. Denald was about to leave England for a long American tour, and all he had was staked on its success.

Julie rose and came toward him, conscious of triumph and hungry for praise. Well, Don, what do you say?

You are changed, dear Julie! You have done much; but are you quite satisfied? She glanced over her shoulders into a mirror that reflected her beautiful face, and flashed a smile to the reflection of his.

"Then-I can say nothing, but 'charmin,' y dear girl, charmin'!"

He held out his hand, but she drew back. "Do you think I am ungrateful, Don?" "I think you are spoiled—it's a pity—you are building up your own limitations. Goodby, Julie! Failure never hurt you, but suc cess is a more cruel fire. Good by!

Julie, with a sudden impulse of cruelty,

"Utter failure has evidently spoiled you, Don, even you!" Donald understood. He had failed, utterly failed, to win her love, and with a last "good-by" he left her,

"Up and down, up and down, with a step that faltered or quickened, according to his troubled thoughts, Donald Carter paced up and down the dreary room of a small hotel, in a city of the far west. Julie Stern was in the city; he heard her praises on every side. He had been to see her play, but determined, and without any wavering from a deep resolve, to keep her from the knowledge of his losses and disap-'If I have failed-what matters?" said

Donald, throwing himself into a low chair in the dark, gloomy room. "Others suc-ceed! If I fall out, the ranks close up and the march goes on!" There was a slight sound at the other end of the room, and he lifted his eyes. Silence, Then, suddenly, out of the shadows-quickly, impulsively—there came toward him-She heard his quickening breath; she saw the change in his careworn face by the fading light at the window; but she paused for one minute. There was a scarlet handker-chief in her hand, and with a twist and sely-tied knot, it was turned into a cap The old, half-forgotten scene sprang up in his memory. It was little Phillippe, who was kneeling by his side-no, it was Julie! "Don! There is no glory for me without your praise! There is no happiness without your love!"

He tried to speak, but she twined her arm

"You have only loved me for a few years, but I have loved you since I was a child! In all my work—in dejection and in joy—I have tried and tried to be good enough for you Even when you went away, when I was playing Juliet-

There was a long pause. He took her hand and laid it against his lips, but there was something so unlike himself, so quiet and subdued, that Julie looked at him with frightened, wide open eyes.

"Dear Donald, you are very ill and

'Not now, not now," he whispered in a broken voice; "but sometimes, Julie, I have thought it would be well to strive no more. My spirit failed me. I never realized this, un your sympathy-

She did not draw his hands away from his face, but laid her own over them. When he looked up at last, the scarlet cap on her dark hair was the only bright spot of color the waning light.

My little Phillippe!" he exclaimed. Then, a something of his old, mocking tone It was sweet of you to remind me, but, dearest Julie, isn't it a little like the end the fifth act-old associations, and a badplayed proposal to soft music? There! see how flippant I have grown!'

You are quite unchanged, Don!" sho

'Oh, my dear love. I began to fear tha were too sad ever to help me again. Donald thrilled to her eager voice, and re-Yes, Julie, we will do great things to gether, you and I!"-N. Y. Weekly.
