Newspaper men have more grievances than the merchants, but they are more long suffering. They do more for the good of the town than any other agency, and yet a great deal of printing that could be done just as satisfactorily here is sent away. And newspaper men, with their great big hearts, do lots of puffing of money making events for religious and benevolent organizations free of charge, and sometimes the same organiza tions get the printing they pay for away from the newspapers. And that's why newspaper men, if troubled with the least bit of sensitiveness, find their great big hearts sort of ossilying as they grow older. - Hughesville

The Schuykill people who want the Legislature to amend the license law so as to remove from the discretion of the court the number of licenses that shall be granted, have prepared a table showing the number of saloons and the population in the leading places in that county. In McAdoo there is a saloon for every seventy-three inhabitants: in Girardville one for every 102; in Minersville, one for every 104; in Pottsville, one for every 202; in Tamaqua, one for every 458; and so on with a number of other places. Port Carbon appears to be the least favored, having but one saloon for each 329 inhabitants, and yet they can all get as much as they want to drink most likely. The agitators in this movement want the Judges restrained from granting more than one license for each 300 inhabitants.

At first the jury stood two pent ere it was too late. Under the tree to the right of the tabernacle tent and outside of the circle stood a comely-looking, well-dressed, goodfaced boyish looking young man from Bloomsburg, who, like so many other young men had gone on the excursion for a day's outing and good time to Mountain Grove Camp Meeting. While strolling with a young triend the voice of the divine caught his attention and he stopped for a moment. But his interest in the sermon grew until an hour had passed and the sermon ended and ere it closed his companion saw tears of repentance roll down his cheek, but indecision plainly portrayed itself in his face. "Shall I or shall I not flee from the wrath to come?" He pondered in his soul, the good angel all the while saying "Yes" the evil one prompting "No," and saying, "There is plenty of time in the future," and in a moment of weakness, with a heavy heart, he turned his back from the one who preached salvation to all and from the altar of mercy before him and his companion he drove thoughts of heaven and hell away in pursuit of pleasure.
